CHARGERS OPEN 2021 SEASON IN NATION'S CAPITOL

The Los Angeles Chargers open the 2021 season at Washington, kicking off at 10:00 a.m. PT from FedExField. Spero Dedes and Jay Feely have the call on CBS while Matt "Money" Smith, Daniel Jeremiah and Shannon Farren will broadcast on the Chargers Radio Network airwaves on ALT FM-98.7. Adrian Garcia-Marquez and Francisco Pinto will present the game in Spanish on Que Buena FM 105.5/94.3.

Sunday marks the third season-opening meeting between the teams, with the squads splitting the two previous matchups. The Chargers won most recently in the 2001 season-opener at home, 30-3. The Bolts have an overall record of 34-27 in season openers. Los Angeles won the last matchup with Washington, 30-13 in a 2017 home win at StubHub Center.

Los Angeles is scheduled to travel 25,467 miles for road games this year, one of five NFL teams in 2021 that will travel around the world (a trip around the world is approximately 25,000 miles). The Bolts will be the only NFL team to have gone 'around the world' in each of the last five seasons (2017-21).

Reigning Offensive Rookie of the Year Justin Herbert looks to build off his 2020 season, where he put forth a record-setting rookie campaign. He will still have weapons such as Keenan Allen, Mike Williams and Austin Ekeler, and will also have newly-signed TE Jared Cook to stretch the defense. Herbert will be playing behind a revamped offensive line, which includes three free agent signings — Corey Linsley, Matt Feiler and Oday Aboushi — and the addition of first-round rookie Rashawn Slater. The defense will again feature Joey Bosa, Derwin James Jr., and Kenneth Murray Jr.

Washington's defense is led by reigning Defensive Rookie of the Year Chase Young alongside Montez Sweat. Ryan Fitzpatrick will quarterback for the defending NFC East Champions, who look to repeat as division winners for the first time since 1984.

The Chargers open the home slate of games for the 2021 season against the Dallas Cowboys. It will be the first matchup between the two teams since the Bolts won on Thanksgiving in 2017. Kickoff is slated for 1:25 p.m. PT from SoFi Stadium.

BY THE NUMBERS

- 28 Rookie LB Nick Niemann's 28 tackles this preseason led the NFL. His total ties for the fourth-most by in a single preseason since 2015.
- 22 Of players on the Los Angeles active roster, 22 players are new to the team this season, including nine draft selections, an undrafted free agent, nine veteran free agents and three waiver claims.

Chargers Head Coach

Record vs. Washington:	0-0 (.000)

Brandon Staley became the 17th head coach in franchise history on Jan. 17, 2021, becoming the first Bolts head coach with a defensive background in over a decade. Staley served as the defensive coordinator in 2020 for the Los Angeles Rams after spending three seasons as the outside linebackers coach for Denver (2019) and Chicago (2017-18). Staley has coached four Pro Bowlers, some of the most dominant defensive NFL players in recent memory — Khalil Mack in 2018, Von Miller in 2019 and Aaron Donald and Jalen Ramsey in 2020. Three of those players (Mack, Donald and Ramsey) were also recognized by The Associated Press as first-team All-Pro selections.

As one of the most progressive defensive minds in football, Staley overhauled a Rams defense to become the best defense in football in 2020. The unit ranked No. 1 in total defense, passing defense and scoring defense while finishing as the third-best rushing defense. The Rams defensive unit improved by more than four points per game in scoring defense from 2019 to post the best single-season average allowed by the team in nearly two decades. Prior to coaching in the NFL, Staley spent three seasons (2013, '15-16) at John Carroll as defensive coordinator/secondary coach and the 2014 season as defensive coordinator/linebackers at James Madison. In his final season as a collegiate coach, Staley earned National Coordinator of the Year honors for Division III by leading his unit to rank third in the nation in total defense (218.0 ypg) and fourth in scoring defense (12.6 ppg).

Staley played quarterback at the University of Dayton, serving as a team captain and was a two-year starter. The Flyers posted a 16-5 record when Staley was the starter from 2003-04. He ended his playing career at Mercyhurst College, playing there in 2005 with his twin brother, Jason. A native of Perry, Ohio, Staley and his wife, Amy, have three sons — Colin, Will and Grant.

RON RIVERA

Washington Head Coach

Overall Record:	86-77-1 (.524)

Ron Rivera enters his 25th season coaching in the NFL and his second as Washington's head coach in 2021. He was named the 30th head coach in franchise history on Jan. 1, 2020 and led Washington to their first division title since 2015. During the 2020 season Rivera was diagnosed with Squamous Cell Carcinoma (SCC) located in a lymph node and detected from a self-care check. Rivera continued to coach through his treatments and on January 28, 2021, he was declared cancer free. Rivera was selected as the NFC Coach of the Year by the Committee of 101 following the 2020 season.

He most recently served as the head coach of the Carolina Panthers for nine seasons, where he led the team to three straight divisional titles and an appearance in Super Bowl 50. Rivera was also recognized twice as the NFL Coach of the Year by the Associated Press in 2013 and in 2015. An All-American at the University of California, Rivera finished his career as the school's all-time leader in sacks with 22 and tackles with 336.

Born Jan. 7, 1962, in Fort Ord, Calif., Rivera lived in Germany, Panama, Washington and Maryland before his family settled in Marina, Calif. He attended Seaside High School in Seaside, Calif. Rivera and his wife, Stephanie, have two children, Christopher and Courtney. Stephanie is a former assistant coach for the WNBA's Washington Mystics.

 - If done within the first six games of the season, would reach 50 sacks faster than any player in Chargers history (Leslie O'Neal, 70 games).

CB Tevaughn Campbell

- Needs one interception return for a touchdown for the second of his career. The Toronto native would be the sixth foreign-born player with multiple pick-sixes in NFL history.

RB Austin Ekeler

- Needs two touchdown catches to reach 18 for his career, passing Danny Woodhead for the most by an undrafted running back in the common draft era (since 1967).

WR Jalen Guyton

- Needs four receptions of 50-plus yards to tie Victor Cruz (seven) for the most catches to go for at least 50 yards by an undrafted player in their 30 career games.

CB Chris Harris Jr.

- Needs an interception returned for a touchdown for the fifth of his career. It would tie Otis Smith for the most by any undrafted defender in the last 25 years (since 1996).

QB Justin Herbert

- With four completions, would be the only quarterback in pro football history to complete 400 passes over the first 16 starts of a career.
- With 164 passing yards, would become the second quarterback in pro football history to post 4,500 passing yards in the first 16 starts of a career (Patrick Mahomes — 5,100 yards).

C Corey Linsley

- With a start on Sunday, will have started all 100 career games.

CB Asante Samuel Jr.

- With a start, would be the first Chargers rookie cornerback to start in his NFL debut since Sammy Davis did so in 2003 at Kansas City.
- With an interception, would be just the seventh Chargers defender to pick off a pass in his NFL debut since the 1970 NFL-AFL merger.

BRANDON STALEY TAKES THE HELM

The Los Angeles Chargers hired Brandon Staley as the 17th head coach in franchise history, becoming the first Bolts head coach with a defensive background in over a decade. Staley served as the defensive coordinator in 2020 for the Los Angeles Rams after spending three seasons as the outside linebackers coach for Denver (2019) and Chicago (2017-18).

Staley has coached four Pro Bowlers, some of the most dominant defensive NFL players in recent memory — Khalil Mack in 2018, Von Miller in 2019 and Aaron Donald and Jalen Ramsey in 2020. Three of those players (Mack, Donald and Ramsey) were also recognized by The Associated Press as first-team All-Pro selections. He looks to continue the trend with star Bolts defenders Joey Bosa and Derwin James Jr.

As one of the most progressive defensive minds in football, Staley overhauled a Rams defense to become the best defense in football in 2020. The unit ranked No. 1 in total defense, passing defense and scoring defense while finishing as the third-best rushing defense. The Rams defensive unit improved by more than four points per game in scoring defense from 2019 to post the best single-season average allowed by the team in nearly two decades.

Staley brought innovation on defense from college to the NFL, serving as outside linebackers coach in Chicago (2017-18) and Denver (2019). He served on Vic Fangio's staff in Denver after following the former defensive coordinator from Chicago. The 2019 Broncos defense led the NFL in red zone scoring, allowing a touchdown on just 39.1 percent of red zone drives — the second-lowest allowed by any NFL defense in the last five seasons. In his two years with Chicago, the Bears led the NFL in takeaways (58) while tying for No. 2 with 92 sacks. Staley was part of a staff in 2018 that coached the top-ranked scoring defense in football (17.7 points per game).

Prior to coaching in the NFL, Staley spent three seasons (2013, '15-16) at John Carroll as defensive coordinator/secondary coach and the 2014 season as defensive coordinator/linebackers at James Madison. In his final season as a collegiate coach, Staley earned National Coordinator of the Year honors for Division III by leading the John Carroll unit to rank third in the nation in total defense (218.0 yards per game) and fourth in scoring defense (12.6 points per game).

Before his stints at John Carroll and James Madison, Staley was a graduate assistant in 2012 at Tennessee. Staley held his first coordinator job as associate head coach/defensive coordinator at Hutchinson (Kan.) Community College from 2010-11. Over those two seasons, he helped develop Cordarrelle Patterson, Markus Golden and De'Vondre Campbell into NFL Draft picks.

Staley began his coaching career as a graduate assistant at Northern Illinois (2006-08) before coaching the defensive line and special teams in 2009 at the University of St. Thomas. He played quarterback at the University of Dayton, serving as a team captain and was a two-year starter. The Flyers posted a 16-5 record when Staley was the starter from 2003-04. He ended his playing career at Mercyhurst College, playing there in 2005 with his twin brother, Jason. A native of Perry, Ohio, Staley and his wife, Amy, have three sons — Colin, Will and Grant.

LOS ANGELES CHARGERS

Dean Spanos is living the dream now, and has no regrets about moving the Chargers to Los Angeles

By Daniel Kaplan
The Athletic
August 17, 2021

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Years of heartbreak showered Dean Spanos on the way to the polished wood, football-shaped conference table he is seated at, located in a conference room just off one of the two luxurious owners suites in SoFi Stadium. It's Sunday, Aug. 8, and a career-defining day for the owner of the Los Angeles Chargers. About 30,000 fans of the team mill around outside awaiting a practice, their first time inside since the stadium opened a year ago, and the first time the Chargers are welcoming fans to a real home since 2016, their penultimate season in San Diego.

There were the 15 years of fruitless political battles in San Diego over a new stadium that never came; Spanos' white-faced shock after the 2016 vote by NFL owners in favor of what would become the L.A. Rams' project over his front-runner bid to build a stadium in Carson, Calif.; the humbling relocation within a year of that to become a minority partner in the Rams' stadium project; the three years in an Orange County soccer stadium getting roasted for the perception the venue was overrun with opposing team fans and not even sold out; the agony of his parents' deaths in 2018; and now the suit filed by his sister, calling her brother all sorts of names in court papers, aiming to force a sale of the Chargers.

But a strange thing happened amid the rumors of a sale, the social media snark, the laughing predictions of failure, and even one report of moving the Chargers to London: the team is attracting fans and very well could sell out this season. In the Los Angeles region, the team identifies 800,000 hardcore Chargers fans — 40 percent of whom are Latino — and another 400,000 more casual fans.

In a 50-plus-minute interview with The Athletic, Spanos opened up publicly for the first time about his feelings on San Diego. He says he has no regrets. And the club is not and will not be for sale, Spanos said, citing his parents' hope to keep the team in the family.

San Diego remains special to Spanos, who lauded the city and said he has quietly contributed millions to charities there since the tumultuous move.

"I spent half my life there," he said of San Diego. "My kids were raised there. I still have a lot of friends and family there. I mean, it's still part of my life. It will always be part of my life. So I can never personally say anything bad about the city of San Diego, nor will I, OK. You want to talk about politics and some of the other things, different story. But it's a great city with great people, and I'm very appreciative of what they did for the Chargers all the years we were there.

"At the end of the day, our family all agreed to make the decision we felt needed to be made. Coming up here, we knew nobody was going to roll out the red carpet for us, and that was fine. Nothing that's happened was unexpected, nothing. So I don't have a second thought about anything. I don't look back and say, 'should've done this or could've done that.' Look, every day I come into this stadium, I look around, I go, 'My God.' I don't think there's another place in the world you could go and get something like this. So I'm very thankful. I'm very grateful to be a part of this."

Earlier this month, the Chargers disclosed they sold more than 45,000 season tickets, each of which includes a personal seat license. That broke the average pace in San Diego over the club's final 20 years there. There are still challenges, including selling pricey club seats. But the sales figure, which could ease past 50,000 come kickoff on Sept. 19 for the first regular-season home game with fans, is not a surprise, or at least shouldn't be. Entertainment venues of all stripes have seen pent-up demand from COVID-19; SoFi Stadium is a $6 billion marvel that is sure to wow Angelenos; and the team boasts arguably the most valuable currency in all of professional sports — an exciting young quarterback in Justin Herbert.

"And I think you go right to one, one player, it's our quarterback," Spanos said. "And you know, Los Angeles is a competitive market. We've got 11 or 12 teams competing for attention here. And so it's not just winning, per se, but it's kind of the show you put on. I think we already have an exciting team, and we're going to be even more exciting this year. Ultimately, I think that's what people really want in this town. Yes, you have to win. But it's also how you win. So that part of it is 'Hollywood,' if you will."

L.A. is really a two-team market — the Dodgers and Lakers — and everyone else. Those other teams — MLS, NHL, the Angels, college teams, the Clippers and the NFL entrants — are competing against not just each other but sun, beaches and all that Southern California has to offer. During the NFL's 21-year absence from L.A. — 1994-2015 — a generation there grew up rooting for other NFL teams, so the Chargers and Rams must contend with that, too.

One of those fans is Jeanie Buss, the L.A. Lakers owner who picked up playing fantasy football without any local NFL teams (she dropped it ultimately in silent protest of the former name of the Washington Football Team). Seated crisscross applesauce on a living room chair in her townhouse in the L.A. neighborhood Playa Vista, the front door wide open, Buss said she knows very well from the Showtime Lakers what it takes to get the city's attention.

"You have to have a winning team, you have to have a successful team, and it helps to have charismatic people," said Buss, who predicted the Rams and Chargers would sell out all their games this year. "Any business in L.A. is fighting for attention. There's a lot to do here, you know we've got amusement parks and beaches and beautiful weather. So we're always fighting for attention ... not only is it great to win, but you have to do it with a sense of style. And, you know, kind of create something that you stand for, and then kind of build the pieces around that. Stay true to the brand that you're trying to create or that you know."

In 2017, Buss, whose mother was a Chargers fan, organized a dinner for Spanos at hotspot restaurant Craig's, with about 20 media and business leaders attending, to ease his way into the L.A. cultural milieu. Hotspots, though, are not really Spanos' thing. He debates with staff whether his go-to places can qualify as dives (they don't think so). And he rejects, despite being seated less than a mile from the Forum, the birthplace of the Lakers' Showtime, inviting celebrities and influencers to games, calling such programs "phony." Many teams actively recruit celebrities to games, but for the Chargers, they will get no special invitation.

"I don't seek out a world of paparazzi or any of that stuff," he said. "I don't particularly like that personally. It's just not me. Sometimes it can't be helped I guess. I've got some go-to spots that, I don't know if you'd call them dive joints, but a lot of them are kind of beachy type places. More unassuming. That's what I like. Because I don't get dressed up. I mean, I like to wear jeans and my shorts and stuff."

Buss describes Spanos as humble and as someone who is not transactional, meaning he doesn't offer favors as part of quid pro quo. "He doesn't have to beat you over the head with all the great things he's done. Because trust me, I've met many people in this town" like that, she said. Mark Ridley-Thomas, an L.A. city council member, chooses the adjective modest to describe Spanos, and also calls him "uncomplicated."

In fact, Spanos may have been too humble in the run-up to that 2016 relocation vote by NFL owners. Loyal to the league, he checked off every line of the relocation guidelines, toiling for a decade and a half trying to replace the decrepit venue the Chargers played at in San Diego. The NFL's L.A. owners committee even voted 5-1 for his project in Carson, which would have created a stadium shared with the Raiders. That typically is as good as gold because owners almost never buck committee votes.

And would they buck it for an owner, the Rams' Stan Kroenke, who arguably failed to meet the relocation guidelines (St. Louis' lawsuit on that is proceeding to trial)? Enough owners privately told Spanos he had their support, making him super confident the morning of the vote. And then Kroenke's billions of dollars and powerful backers won the day, though not by enough that he didn't have to accept the Chargers as a partner if they left San Diego.

Decamp San Diego, they would, fueling bitter resentment and vitriol, which seeped into coverage of the team's three years at the Home Depot Center, primarily the home of MLS' L.A. Galaxy. Pictures of empty seats in a 27,000-seat stadium fueled a narrative the Chargers were interlopers. The seats that were filled often had large swaths of opposing team colors. The story went that the Chargers were destined to embarrass the league when the itinerant franchise moved into the plush new stadium.

"That's a bunch of bullshit," L.A. resident and sports broadcaster Jim Gray said of the idea that the Chargers somehow don't have fans because opposing team boosters were filling their temporary home. "Have you been to any one of these stadiums where this isn't the case because of all of the availability now through Ticketmaster and StubHub. ... The folks say, 'I'd rather have X number of dollars more than my tickets and I'll sit home and watch it on TV.' This is symptomatic all across the National Football League."

Ridley-Thomas, the city council member, said the team, and Spanos' construction company, have quietly supported local causes, like ending homelessness and employing high-risk youth, which has quickly made the club a part of the community.

"He has integrated himself into the environment from the vantage point of the leadership of the Chargers saying, 'This is who we are. We are here to be a competitive franchise. But more to the point, we're here to be a part of this community in a very real way.'"

Amy Trask, the former president of the Raiders and an L.A. resident, said the team's community efforts are making a dent.

"I've noticed a consistent increase in the amount of Chargers gear (hats, shirts, license plate frames, etc.) throughout the region, particularly the beach areas," she said. "It is my sense that there is both excitement about the team's on-field prospects as well as a growing appreciation for the considerable community and charitable work the Chargers have been and are doing. The Chargers are going about their business quietly, yet people are taking notice, and there sure is a lot of Chargers gear at the beach."

A full SoFi Stadium on Chargers game days and team swag around L.A. could go a long way toward diminishing the dark cloud that seems to hang over the team, whether that's the seemingly endless supply of excruciatingly painful ways to lose (the team has failed to make the playoffs in nine of the past 11 seasons) or the family legal battle. Dea Berberian, Spanos' sister, is suing to force a sale of the team, contending her brother has mismanaged the family trust that owns 36 percent of the team.

"Dean is a 'do-nothing' trustee whose only interest is in running the team and hoping he can prove his critics wrong about moving the Chargers to Los Angeles," one Berberian motion charged.

In her initial April 1 court filing, she attached a 2019 letter from her brother in which he pledges to hire an investment banker by 2024 to explore selling the team. While Spanos set as a ground rule for the interview no questions about the litigation, he stressed his father's wish was for the team to stay in family hands.

"And I just remember dad always telling all of us, mom right there with him, 'I don't ever want to sell this team,'" Spanos said. "He worked so hard to own a team that one day he'd be able to give to his children. And now we're living his dream. Where we are right now as a franchise, we're not just set up for success, we're set up for sustained success. We have the stability that we're going to need not only for the rest of me and my siblings' lifetimes but for our kids' and nieces' and nephews' lifetimes. That's always what I'm looking at because that was my dad's dream."

His dad, Alex, a construction magnate, bought the team after failed pushes to buy the expansion Tampa Bay Buccaneers and then the San Francisco 49ers in the late 1970s and a brief flirtation with the USFL. When he bought the Chargers for $40 million in 1984, Dean said his dad told him he would always be thankful for the purchase. The franchise today is worth billions of dollars.

Spanos' great regret is not winning the franchise's first Super Bowl before his parents died.

"The biggest thing to me in terms of disappointment would have to be mom and dad not being here because that was the one thing I wanted to do and have happen before they passed away," he said. "But it didn't happen. We got close. To win it right now would still obviously be special. Very special. To win your first Super Bowl in the first season with fans in this amazing new place, you couldn't script it any better."

Justin Herbert, Chargers ready to be West Coast's next Cinderella squad

*By Adam Schein

April 1, 2021*

The streak is over.

This is the spot in my annual column announcing my choice for the upcoming season's Cinderella team where I normally recount my string of past successes. The 2017 Jaguars reached the AFC title game. The 2018 Bears captured their first division title in eight years. The 2019 Bills won double-digit games for the first time since 1999.

And the 2020 Cardinals ... well, the 2020 Cardinals lost to two backup quarterbacks in the final two weeks of the season, falling out of the playoff race and finishing 8-8. For the first time in four years, my Cinderella team missed the postseason.

I'm still annoyed, even if this isn't technically supposed to be a playoff pick. Nevertheless, I remain undaunted in my search for a sleeper who can capture the hearts and minds of a nation. And unlike last year, when the COVID-19 pandemic shut down the sports world, I can seek inspiration from what has arguably been the best NCAA men's basketball tournament ever.

Thinking about the way Pac-12 teams have repeatedly shocked the experts, with 11th-seeded UCLA's stunning win over top-seeded Michigan in the Elite Eight capping a record-setting run of upsets by the Bruins, 12th-seeded Oregon State, seventh-seeded Oregon and sixth-seeded USC, I found myself channeling the words of the great Coolio:

Ain't no party like a West Coast party, 'cause a West Coast party don't stop!

He's right. And the party baton is about to be carried into the NFL season by my 2021 Cinderella team: the Los Angeles Chargers.

The key in this exercise is identifying a team that did not make the playoffs last season and that is not on the radar of most people (which rules out teams like the Cowboys, who should be favorites in the NFC East with Dak Prescott returning). I know the Chargers seem to attract offseason buzz like it's their business, but they also have regularly failed to make good on it -- meaning they are, in a way, an ideal post-hype-ish choice.

Plus, like Cinderella's slipper, the Bolts just feel right.

It starts with the quarterback. Regular readers (and listeners and viewers) know I've been obsessed with Justin Herbert since long before Los Angeles' brilliant decision to draft him sixth overall last year. I was enamored with Herbert's arm, athleticism, accuracy, smarts, leadership and poise, and how it could translate into instant NFL stardom. It all came to fruition in a debut season for the ages, with the former Oregon Duck throwing for 4,336 yards and 31 TDs (against just 10 picks) before capturing the Offensive Rookie of the Year award.

He developed a tremendous rapport with underrated star receiver Keenan Allen while showing he's the kind of special player who elevates everyone around him. The kid has it.

And that's just what we saw last year, when he started off as a backup who had to adjust to the NFL during a COVID-limited offseason. Think of what Herbert will be able to do in 2021, entering as an entrenched starter.

Think of what he'll be able to do with a new coach.

I love ex-Chargers coach Anthony Lynn, who earned my vote for Coach of the Year in 2018, when he helped the team to a 12-4 record and playoff berth. He's a great person. But the team was dropping too many close games, racking up more defeats by seven points or less (15) in the past two seasons than any other NFL team in that span, and Lynn's game-management was a significant problem. Losing was becoming too normal. A change was needed.

Brandon Staley is the right guy at the right time. While there is always an unknown surrounding first-year coaches, Staley represents a calculated upgrade. The well-respected defensive whiz, whose players seemed to love playing for him in previous stops with the Rams, Broncos and Bears, will end the run of "you can't make 'em up" losses that has been dogging the Chargers.

Yes, what really gets me excited about this team is thinking about all the additions that were made to help Herbert, from Staley to Corey Linsley, who will be worth every single penny of his five-year, $62.5 million deal as the new leader of the offensive line. I raved about the fit and contract in this space last week -- he's the best center in football. Tight end Jared Cook, filling in for the departed Hunter Henry on a one-year deal, is a great replacement who will be able to groove with the QB.

And I cannot wait to see what general manager Tom Telesco does with the 13th pick in the 2021 NFL Draft.

Telesco is a huge part of this. He's a brilliant talent evaluator, and he's loaded the roster with promising players who haven't even reached their peak yet. Think of their overlooked depth and ability at running back (2020 fourth-rounder Joshua Kelley) and receiver (former undrafted players Jalen Guyton and Tyrion Johnson).

One year ago, a few months after Telesco picked linebacker Kenneth Murray with a second first-rounder, I made the case that the Chargers' defense was the best in the NFL. While Murray was terrific as a tackling machine, logging 107 total tackles (second-most among rookies last season), I had to back off that bold claim when safety Derwin James was lost for the 2020 season. James will be back, and he will thrive in Staley's dynamic and diverse scheme. Joey Bosa is a flat-out monster at defensive end, one of the best defensive players in the sport. He's a nightmare for opposing quarterbacks -- and I think Staley can make him even better. That's scary.

Obviously, it will be tough to win the AFC West, where Patrick Mahomes and the Chiefs loom. But I love this Chargers group, which is just silly with upside. The right people are in place -- and they will get me back on track after the Cardinals let me down last year.

The slipper will go back on that foot. And somewhere, Coolio will be smiling. Because this West Coast party is going to roll long past midnight.

State of the 2021 Los Angeles Chargers: Can Brandon Staley lift talented roster into NFL playoffs?

Members of the Chargers organization, Chargers fans around the world and those who are still waiting on for a remake on this classic song: Super Chargers song

Today is a great day to be a fan of the Los Angeles Chargers. I know, you might have heard this before and these words reach you with some skepticism.

But the Chargers are truly in a great spot. A young innovative coach and staff. One of the best young quarterbacks in the game. And a defense that can even put a scare into Patrick Mahomes.

The Chargers could make some noise this season.

How the Chargers got here

Let's take a quick look back at the highs and lows of the 2020 season.

The highs:

- Finding the franchise QB. I know it had been a long drought going from Philip Rivers to Justin Herbert. I mean it as all of checks notes one game. And I know it was weird the way Justin got his first start. But who cares. You have a franchise quarterback again. You went from Drew Brees to Philip Rivers to Justin Herbert. As a fan of a franchise that has struggled to find a quarterback (I support the Bears), I was jealous.

- Blue streak. It's the annual rite of fall. Out of playoff contention, the Chargers go on a massive winning streak to pad their record and make things not look so bad. This time, the Chargers closed out with four straight wins.

The lows:

- Bittersweet opener. The Chargers opened the season with a win at Cincinnati, which was huge. And then Herbert made his surprise start in Week 2. But the Chargers lost a heartbreaker in overtime. They had taken 20-17 lead with 2:27 remaining, but the Chiefs drove down the field to force overtime and eventually won the game.

- Skidding. The Chargers had a four-game skid to limp into the bye week at 1-4. After a win over Jacksonville, they dropped three more consecutive games to basically remove themselves from playoff contention. But at least you didn't lose to the Jets like the Rams did.

2021 VIPs

Head coach: Brandon Staley. The NFL went an entire year without hiring a Sean McVay assistant, so thankfully the league course corrected with the hiring of Staley. It's like when Disney didn't churn out the same kids movie over and over, but hey, they've made one and this time they are sea monsters. I'm kidding. Luca was great. But I do really like the hiring of Staley, the Rams defensive coordinator from a season ago.

You know, McVay made a bold move to remove Wade Phillips and go with Staley. But it was perfect. The Rams led the NFL in scoring defense (18.5), total defense (281.9) and pass defense (190.7) in his first year as defensive coordinator. Staley was also part of some good defenses in Denver and Chicago, learning under Vic Fangio. And he's coming to a Chargers team that's already pretty damn good defensively. You're building a team that will have a defensive identity -- one that could be the best in the league. And you combine that with a franchise quarterback who looked like the real deal last year. In fact, let's just get into that for a moment.

Quarterback: Justin Herbert. I was apprehensive about Herbert last year because I was worried about his performances in some big games at Oregon. And well, I'm an idiot because Justin had one of the best rookie seasons a quarterback has ever had. He set an NFL record with 31 touchdown passes. His 4,336 passing yards were the second-most by a rookie right behind Andrew Luck. But remember, Justin did not play in the team's first game of the season.

And I know a lot of people -- cough Vikings fans cough -- were a little miffed that Herbert won the 2020 Offensive Rookie of the Year award. But be serious. Justin Jefferson was amazing last year. But a record-breaking franchise quarterback is getting that hardware. And there is reason to believe Herbert can be even better this year.

Projected 2021 MVP: Joey Bosa, edge. One of the most-exciting things to look forward to this season is Staley working with Bosa who has been one of the best players in the game when healthy. Bosa led the Chargers with 7.5 sacks last year but missed four games with a concussion and shin injury. He has missed at least four games in three of his five seasons.

But when he's on the field, he's dominant. He had 12.5 sacks in 2017 and 11.5 sacks in 2019, his two full seasons in the NFL. And Staley's defense was first in the league last year. This could be a season when we see Bosa emerge as the best in the game. Kind of like when Leonardo DiCaprio went from being the guy from Growing Pains and Poison Ivy to the guy in The Basketball Diaries and Titanic.

2021 breakout star: Tyron Johnson, receiver. I feel like we do this every year with Chargers receivers. Keenan Allen is truly one of the best in the game, and perhaps, one of the most overlooked pass-catchers. But we're always looking for that Dick Grayson-like sidekick. While Mike Williams will be talked about a lot, I'm looking forward to seeing Johnson. A former practice squad receiver who quietly developed some chemistry with Herbert. He had 20 receptions for 398 yards and three touchdowns last year. And he was called out by Staley in this press conference.

No, in a good way. Remember, TJ was the club leader in air yards per target? Herbert threw 11 deep pass touchdowns (20+ air yards) last year, which was tied for third in the league, according to Next Gen Stats. That's on a Russell Wilson, Patrick Mahomes and Aaron Rodgers level.

New face to know: Corey Linsley, center. Daps (are we still saying that?) to Linsley for getting out of Green Bay. He doesn't need to worry about getting caught up in the Aaron Rodgers drama; instead, he traded in for a younger quarterback and is likely living the life in Newport Beach. Or at least that's where I would have chosen to go. Not too bad for him. Linsley is coming off an All-Pro season (his first) and will hopefully anchor a line that used the fifth-most combinations last year. And that will be important. Herbert led the NFL with 1,113 passing yards and nine touchdowns under pressure in 2020. He was sacked 32 times in 2020, which was tied for the ninth-most in the league. And the Chargers had the third-worst PFF pass-blocking grade (54.5) and worst run-blocking grade (46.5) in the NFL in 2020.

The 2021 roadmap

The competitive urgency index is: MEDIUM. You have a first-year coach, so you can't have these wild expectations for the Chargers. But at the same time, you have this pretty incredible roster, so maybe you can expect to win some games.

Three key dates:

- Week 3 at Kansas City Chiefs. The Chargers open with two winnable games at Washington and at home against the Cowboys. But they then go on the road to K.C., where they have had some success. And follow that with a home game against the Raiders.

- Week 11 vs. Pittsburgh Steelers. I'm interested to see how the Steelers play this season. I feel like both teams are in a spot where they aren't the best team in the division but will be competing for a playoff spot.

- Week 17 vs. Denver Broncos. Man, the last three games of the season should be against division rivals. I'll have to settle for a home date with the Broncos and closing the season in Vegas for the Chargers. This could be (and should be) for a playoff berth.

Will the Chargers be able to ...

Get the rookie version of Derwin James? My guy Dan Hanzus has James listed as his MVP for the Chargers this season, and I really like that pick. The Chargers stole him in the 2018 NFL Draft and he was pretty damn good. I mean, if you consider being an ALL-PRO pretty good. I don't know, you might have a different definition. The only thing is that injuries have derailed him over the last couple of seasons. He's played in just five games in the last two years. But the good news is, he was on the field for the team's most recent OTAs. And playing for Staley should give him the opportunity to put the last two years behind him and get back to that All-Pro level.

Be even better on offense? It's a weird thing to be talking about, I know. The Chargers were top 10 in total yards per game, passing yards per game and third-down percentage last season. But they did not have a player with 1,000 scrimmage yards in 2020.

I know, I would have thought Austin Ekeler had done it, too, despite him missing six games with a hamstring injury. He finished with 933 scrimmage yards, leading the team for the second consecutive year. Allen had 100 receptions but finished with 992 receiving yards to go with eight touchdowns. Going for 100 receptions but less than 1,000 receiving yards seems pretty tough to do. Allen ranks in the top six in the NFL in receptions and receiving yards since 2017. And, I don't know, maybe if the line can block for Herbert a little bit this season, then maybe they can put it all together for an even better year.

Proceed with Jared Cook? This is one of the things that would go along with the previous point. Hunter Henry signed with the New England Patriots during the offseason. The Chargers replaced him with Cook. And even though he's 34, I really do like this signing. He has familiarity with Joe Lombardi when he played in New Orleans. Cook's been productive over the last number of years. Lock him in for about 400 yards and five-ish touchdowns. And with some of the players I've already mentioned like Ekeler, Keenan and my guy Ty Johnson, he doesn't need to be a superstar. He can just be a small part of an ensemble cast. Like Ted on Scrubs. He wasn't the main character. But he was an underrated gem who stole most of the scenes he was in. Cook just needs to pick his spots, and I would venture to say the Chargers don't miss Henry at all.

One storyline ...

... people are overlooking: How good Staley's defense was against the deep ball. The Chargers allowed a 111.2 passer rating on deep passes last season, which ranked 25th in the NFL. The Rams allowed a 29.2 passer rating on deep passes last year, which was first in the league. But then again, when Nick Foles is missing a wide open Darnell Mooney -- sorry not the time for that. I apologize. But man, if the Chargers can shore this up ... And they drafted Asante Samuel Jr. in the second round. This guy was a steal. Last year, PFF had him forcing 30 incompletions, tied for the second-most among cornerbacks in FBS since 2018. He also allowed a passer rating of 46.2 last season, which led the ACC.

... people are overlooking: Chase Daniel is the backup. Holy lord, I love Chase Daniel. He's made a career off being a backup quarterback.

He's the Allen Covert of the NFL. And you probably don't know that name. But once you Google him, you're going to be like, "Oh yeah, that guy." And you're going to want to give me a fist bump the next time you see me.

... people are overthinking: Touchdown regression for Justin Herbert. The previous three quarterbacks to tie or break the rookie passing touchdown record did not increase their passing touchdown production the following season. Peyton Manning, Russell Wilson and Baker Mayfield all had fewer touchdowns. Only Dan Marino had more. My thing is, don't look at his passing touchdowns (I still took him in my dynasty draft). Because if the defense plays better, maybe Justin doesn't have to throw the ball 90 times a game. And the Chargers are playing with a lead. So don't judge Justin's second year on touchdowns alone.

... people are also overthinking: The coaching staff. I mentioned Lombardi, who is coming from New Orleans, which is great. Renaldo Hill is the defensive coordinator. And maybe it's just my thing. But I like when these young coaches have a veteran, former head coach on the staff like when McVay had Phillips. But then I look at Joe Judge and Jason Garrett and I've already talked me out of this. Do your thing, Staley, I believe in you.

For the 2021 season to be a success, the Chargers MUST ...

Not lose games in horrific fashion. I mean, check out Twitter any time the Chargers lose. Because people -- who once said it as a joke -- now have legitimate empathy for the Chargers finding creative ways to lose. At least until the playoffs are out of reach and they go on a winning streak to close out the season.

In closing

Chargers seasons can be a lot like DC movies. They get all sorts of hype and buildup. You purchase your ticket. And you end up walking away disappointed. Well, maybe that was true years ago. DC has been on a roll lately, and I would even say it's outdoing Marvel in some spots. Likewise, I really do believe the Chargers are ready for big things again. It would be dangerous to just write them off as the "same old Chargers" because that's just not the case.

17-Game Regular Season Confirmed: Chargers to Host Vikings in 2021

By Hayley Elwood
Chargers.com
March 30, 2021

What was originally discussed a year ago is now official: the NFL regular season is expanding to 17 games beginning in 2021.

For the Bolts, they'll host the Minnesota Vikings as their additional game for the 2021 season.

In 2021, each division will play the interconference opponent from the 2019 season who finished in the same standing as them in 2020. The AFC West played the NFC North in 2019 and the Chargers and Vikings both finished third in their respective divisions last season.

Per the NFL: Under the scheduling formula below, every team plays three preseason games and 17 regular-season games with one bye week. Clubs will host 10 games overall -- either nine regular-season games and one preseason game or eight regular-season games and two preseason games.

The expansion to one regular-season game per team was agreed upon last March as part of the new Collective Bargaining Agreement; however, it wasn't made official until this week, when the NFL club owners officially approved the move.

This marks the league's first expansion since 1978, when they made the switch to a 16-game regular-season.

Mark your calendars because NFL Kickoff Weekend will begin Thursday, Sept. 9. The 2022 Pro Bowl will be played on Sunday, Feb. 6 at Allegiant Stadium in Las Vegas and Super Bowl LVI at SoFi Stadium will occur Sunday, Feb. 13, 2022.

BRANDON STALEY

Brandon Staley gets Chargers to buy in with collaborative culture

By Gilbert Manzano
Orange County Register
July 27, 2021

Brandon Staley was introduced as the Chargers' head coach, but he looked the part of a motivational speaker by comfortably engaging with about 100 high school athletes during a football camp at Long Beach Poly High earlier this month.

Staley noticed three-time Super Bowl champion Willie McGinest standing to his left while he spoke about building relationships and seizing opportunities.

"I told the group, when you're around guys like Willie McGinest, you need to take advantage of that opportunity and introduce yourself," Staley said about the Long Beach area legend who attended Poly and USC before winning championships with the New England Patriots. "You need to be around a guy who comes from where you come from and has achieved all that he has."

"I know I'm going to introduce myself after this because I know that there's things I'm going to learn from him."

Staley learned plenty from McGinest after a lengthy introductory chat about what it takes to win a Super Bowl and how to make a lasting impact in Southern California.

Staley plans on sharing that knowledge from McGinest – and everything he's learned in the past seven months since being hired as the Chargers' head coach – to his 86 players who were expected to report Tuesday for the start of training camp. Staley's first camp practice as a head coach is Wednesday at Jack Hammett Sports Complex in Costa Mesa.

A RELATIONSHIP-DRIVEN COACH

Staley, 38, has quickly made a name for himself as an innovative coach constantly looking to learn from others by forging genuine relationships. His giving-and-receiving approach has led to a meteoric rise since earning his first NFL coaching job with the Chicago Bears in 2017.

He's no longer the assistant coach pushing for a head coaching gig, but he continues to have the same approach and isn't leaning on his impressive credentials, which includes turning the Rams into the top-ranked defense in the NFL last season during his one-year stint as defensive coordinator.

Staley spent the offseason listening and encouraging feedback from his new Chargers players and coaching staff to gain trust and create a collaborative environment.

"It's a position that he has been working really hard for," Chargers edge rusher Joey Bosa said about his first impressions of Staley. "Now, he gets to be the head guy and run things exactly how he wants to. He wanted us to know how confident he is in us as players and how much he trusts us. He's really open to talking and suggestions. It's a great relationship that he's building so far."

Staley's defensive scheme produced winning results with the Rams, but he spent months tweaking it to fit the strengths of the Chargers' defensive roster that features Pro Bowlers Bosa, safety Derwin James and cornerback Chris Harris Jr. and emerging linebackers Kenneth Murray and Drue Tranquill. Staley took the foundation of his defensive system from Broncos coach Vic Fangio when he was his outside linebackers coach in Denver and Chicago from 2017 to 2019. But Staley didn't attempt to replicate Fangio's scheme and added his own wrinkles.

"He is his own man," said Harris when asked to compare Staley to Fangio. Staley coached Harris with the Broncos in 2019. "He is doing it the way that he wants to do it. He's more relational than Vic (Fangio). Vic is kind of closed-door. You have to work your way in with Vic. Coach Staley, he is just a very sociable guy."

Although Staley was assigned to the outside linebackers, he often asked Harris for advice during their lone season together in Denver.

"We talked all of the time, all through the year and during the season," said Harris, a four-time Pro Bowl cornerback. "He would pick my brain, 'Chris, what would you do in this coverage? What did you think on this?' We would just talk football all of the time. From there, I knew that he was a very intelligent coach. He was a very relationship-driven coach. Guys liked him."

"Then Coach Fangio always had opportunities for his assistants to have presentations. Coach Staley always had amazing presentations and always kept everybody upbeat on what he was presenting. From there, I knew that he would definitely have a great chance to be a head coach."

BLENDING IDEAS

Staley, who overcame cancer after being diagnosed with Hodgkin lymphoma at 24, presented himself as a friendly and talkative coach during a 90-minute introductory news conference with Chargers reporters in January.

Chargers assistant coaches and players have yet to see Staley shout in anger and many don't expect that to change when the games arrive – win or lose.

Defensive backs coach Derrick Ansley first worked with Staley in 2012 at the University of Tennessee when Staley was a graduate assistant. Ansley said Staley's friendly personality hasn't changed in the past decade.

"He always came off very humble, very eager to learn and asked a lot of good questions," Ansley said. "You could tell at that age that he was going to go on to bigger and better things. He was always impressive from Day 1. He hasn't changed one bit."

Staley is the latest 30-something NFL head coach with a calm demeanor. He quickly meshed with Rams coach Sean McVay last season because of their similar personalities. Staley will use what he learned from competing against McVay during Rams practices to form the best offensive system for quarterback Justin Herbert, the reigning Offensive Rookie of the Year. But Staley, a former college quarterback at Dayton and Mercyhurst University, will also collect past experiences from his coaching staff.

Quarterbacks coach Shane Day has recent success from working with Kyle Shanahan and the San Francisco 49ers the past two seasons. Offensive line coach Frank Smith made a lasting impact as a tight ends coach with the Las Vegas Raiders and was instrumental in Darren Waller's development. Offensive coordinator Joe Lombardi spent 12 of the past 14 seasons working in New Orleans with Saints coach Sean Payton, who has operated one of the most productive offenses in the NFL since 2006.

"It's been really fun to work with him because he's one of the few guys that's a defensive head coach but also played quarterback," Day said about Staley. "That's a very unique experience. I've really enjoyed having our conversations because he's bringing a lot to the room. He's shared a lot of defensive perspectives with the quarterbacks. When he's able to frame it from a quarterback's perspective, that really helps us integrate it into our thought process. I've really enjoyed a lot of our conversations."

Staley has been busy blending ideas from different perspectives to create a successful operation on the field, but it always goes back to relationships for the coach from Perry, Ohio. Taking the time to get to know his players away from football is how he got the Chargers to quickly buy in, despite his lack of head coaching experience.

BUYING IN

James immediately realized his good friend and Rams cornerback Jalen Ramsey was right about Staley when the two had their first conversation during Staley's tour of the Chargers' facility.

"Everything that I've heard, and everybody I've met through this game, had nothing but great things to say about (Staley)," James said. "Our first talk on his first day here, the day he signed with the Chargers, I remember him just bringing me up here and wanting me to be a part of his moment. For me, it's just relationships. Everything that's been said has been spot on."

Staley has embraced backgrounds and personalities by letting players be themselves. He refers to cornerback Michael Davis by his nickname "Vato," which is Spanish slang for man.

"That's what he likes to be called," Staley said about Davis, who's half Mexican. "If you know Vato, that's such a big part of his story. What you try to do is you try to tap into that, and I think what's so cool about learning L.A., Southern California is that Mexican American, that Latino population is such a huge part of the fabric of this place and what makes it so cool."

"So the fact that we have a player that's half Mexican and what that means to people, because he's so proud of his heritage, yeah, I'm going to tap into that."

Staley has made all the right moves when it comes to building relationships and installing his systems this offseason, but the next phase of his challenge as a first-time head coach is getting his team prepared during training camp as games quickly approach.

RELYING ON TRUST

Staley will have plenty on his plate as the team's defensive play caller, but he plans on leaning on the trust he has with his coaching staff, specifically defensive coordinator Renaldo Hill, who will be in the booth while Staley calls plays on the field.

"I've learned so much from him and we have such a strong professional relationship and personal relationship," Staley said about Hill. "I think having that upstairs perspective as a coordinator, there's going to be things that I think he can help me with between series. ... He can talk to the defensive staff from an adjustment standpoint when my big-picture focus then transitions to (special) teams or offense and I think we've done a lot of trial runs in the spring camp.

"I can't emphasize how special of a coach he is and how much he's meant to our staff and our players."

Staley has quickly risen through the coaching ranks because he listens and wants others to succeed with him. That formula helped him as a small-program college coach at John Carroll University and James Madison and he hasn't gone away from that in the NFL.

The relationships and trust Staley has created since being hired as head coach will dictate how the Chargers go in 2021.

Chargers' new leader a family man: 'I am from the Bruce and Linda Staley coaching tree'

By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
February 5, 2021

It was a single line — just 10 words — from a news conference that stretched beyond an hour and a half:

"I am from the Bruce and Linda Staley coaching tree."

When Detroit unveiled its new head coach on Jan. 21, the guy talked about biting kneecaps and kicking teeth, Dan Campbell's bizarre fit of passion stirring national attention.

On the same day, just a short time later, almost no one noticed when Brandon Staley was introduced by the Chargers and talked about his mom and dad, calling them "my heroes."

This is a coach whose first NFL job came with the 2017 Chicago Bears and noted defensive mind Vic Fangio.

When he was coaching collegiately at John Carroll, Staley was so enamored with Fangio's concepts that he would finish his meetings and game-planning, and rush off to study whatever Fangio was up to next.

Back then, Fangio was San Francisco's defensive coordinator and catching the 49ers on television in Ohio sometimes meant having to go to a nearby sports bar, where Staley would sit alone in wonderment.

After the 2018 season, Fangio left Chicago to become the head coach in Denver and took two assistants with him. One of them was Staley.

Barely a year later, Staley was hired by the Rams to be their defensive coordinator and brought along everything he had learned from his handpicked mentor.

Still, when asked to declare his roots, Staley put family over football, which is understandable given how much this family, bonded by hard reality, has persevered together and kept alive a tradition of teaching.

"I am from the Bruce and Linda Staley coaching tree."

That is Brandon Staley's line and this is the story behind that line.

Everyone else saw him coaching Jalen Ramsey that day, in a moment especially poignant and peeved.

Television cameras showed Staley reasoning with the Rams' all-everything cornerback shortly after Green Bay had taken a one-touchdown lead on an Aaron Rodgers pass.

Ramsey, his team en route to a crushing 32-18 NFC divisional-round playoff loss last month, was visibly upset on the field and now well short of pleased on the sideline.

Sitting at home just outside Pittsburgh, nearly 700 miles from Lambeau Field, Jason Staley watched his twin brother coaching, too, but saw something else entirely.

He saw the woman whose impact was so profound on the Chargers' new coach that it resonates still today, nearly 17 years after her death.

"Watching Brandon teach those guys, I get a little bit of my mom back," Jason said. "I get to see that, and it's just so cool. It's the reason I pay whatever DIRECTV charges me to get his games."

Linda Staley taught sixth-grade English in northeast Ohio before the breast cancer won, ending her 9½-year battle against a disease doctors estimated would take her life in less than one year.

Bruce Staley also was a teacher — fourth-grade math — before he and Linda learned their first child instead would be children, twin boys. A combined annual income of $22,000 wasn't going to work for a household about to double in size.

So Bruce took a second job that eventually became a second career in adhesive materials. He was a coach, too, mostly AAU basketball, working with the twins from fifth grade through their junior years at Perry High, about a 45-minute drive from Cleveland.

He always had an even, measured demeanor on the bench and an equally steady point guard on the floor, Brandon possessing sublime ball-handling skills and the sort of passing ability that led to him setting assist records in high school.

Two decades later, while watching the Rams play the Packers, Jason said he laughed more than once at the images of his brother at work.

"He looks like my dad, kind of stalking the basketball sideline," Jason, 38, said. "It's like a flashback: 'That's my dad. That's what he would do.'"

Brandon knew only two positions growing up: point guard and quarterback. He was the sort of player who almost never was taken out of a game. He was athletic but — at 6 feet, 160 pounds — there just wasn't enough of him.

So he ended up at Dayton, which plays non-scholarship football, arriving as a fifth- or sixth-stringer. During that first year, buried on the depth chart, Brandon attempted to walk on to the school's Division I basketball team. He made the final two before being cut.

He'd end up starting for two seasons in football, operating the Flyers' option offense, being voted a captain and winning 16 of 21 games.

"He was as good as any player we had on the chalkboard," said Mike Kelly, Dayton's coach at the time. "He would always ask why. Most athletes don't ask why. It's, 'OK, Coach, got it,' and they just go to it. Brandon wanted to know why all the time."

The call to return home came during Brandon's junior year. It was his father. Mom was dying. Originally diagnosed with 21 cancerous lymph nodes, Linda's fight had been an extended and courageous one.

The disease showed up when the twins were 11 and not quite two months after they'd lost an aunt, Ann Maltarich, also to breast cancer. The first two years weren't as bad as the seven that followed as Linda's condition intensified, even as she long outlived the forecasts.

"An incredible will," said Bruce, a two-time cancer survivor himself. "Nothing ever negative, either. Not a 'why me' kind of thing. Incredible resolve. Just graceful. That's what I saw."

Linda would spend weeks at a time in the hospital, typically isolated and communicating with her three children — the Staleys have a younger son, Michael — mostly through journals the boys would write.

So they didn't always see the pain, but seeing the struggle was as unavoidable as the sound of their mother in the bathroom getting sick again. Jason said he never saw his father cry, those tears also coming only in private.

"That kind of fight leaves a mark," Jason said. "As kids, you see that and there's no way that doesn't affect you. When you think back to how they handled it and how she fought, those are the things that empower us."

At his introductory news conference, Brandon called his mother "the most graceful, loving, strongest person I know." He also said she remains his inspiration today "as a coach, as a father, as a husband."

He didn't include "as a teacher" but only because there's little difference between teaching and coaching to Brandon, who became more than a son to Linda after she was diagnosed. He and his brothers also became her students.

No longer able to work, Linda taught her sons instead, showing them the importance of building relationships with students and recognizing how each one learns and then using that foundation to build something special.

"She's the best teacher I've ever seen, certainly," Brandon said. "She was always able to reach people that were more difficult to reach. Seeing that up close when I was a little kid, I saw the power in that. I've tried to embody a lot of that as a coach."

The lesson remains powerful today and so, too, does the memory of Linda's goodbye. Jason said the turnout at her funeral was eye-opening in the number of lives his mother touched, all that love expressed after she died on Valentine's Day 2004.

Two busloads of players arrived from Dayton and two more from Mercyhurst College, where Jason played linebacker and was student body vice president. Jason that day even had to help a few of his teammates tie their ties.

"You would have thought the funeral was for a superstar," Bruce, 63, said. "The line to get in this place was unbelievable. It was more than you could have hoped for. I'm sure she would have been thrilled."

Mercyhurst is a small liberal arts school in Erie, Pa., hardly known for its athletes but famous for its underdog. Former heavyweight champion Buster Douglas was recruited to play basketball for the Lakers in the early 1980s before giving up hoops for boxing.

In 2005, the school was home to another long shot — a reunion of the Staley twins, Brandon transferring to play football with his brother one final time, both now graduate students.

They lived together and worked out together, even took a class together. Jason had considered not using his final season of eligibility, but Brandon talked him out of it.

Marty Schaeztle wrote all about the twins that season for one of the school's game-day programs. He knew their story well since Schaeztle also is the Lakers' football coach.

"I think once they lost their mom, they really realized the value of family and time," he said. "I think they believed it would be a very good thing to play one more time together. We were fortunate to be able to make that happen."

Brandon practically dragged Jason to watch film with him and catch his passes. As one of the team's new captains, Jason had no choice but go along, refusing to be outworked by someone who had just arrived on campus.

He also had no interest in looking bad in front of his big brother. See, Brandon is the older twin, by two minutes. Still, there were times when big brother was almost too driven.

"He was a classroom rat, a film rat," Schaeztle recalled of Brandon. "It was natural for him to try to put everything together, from the protections to the routes to what was going on in the backfield. It came to him very naturally."

By that point, Brandon was on his coaching path and, the next year, was a graduate assistant at Northern Illinois. Those 2006 Huskies made the Poinsettia Bowl.

It was on that trip to San Diego that the night sweats and the flu-like symptoms turned worse. Brandon, who also had a growth in his chest, called his dad, and Bruce remembers telling him, "You need to get home and get home now."

The doctors determined it was lymphoma.

"As a twin brother, it's the worst day of your life, scariest moment of your life," Jason said. "I'm feeling guilty because I don't have it. I would have given anything, anything to take that cancer out of him and put it into me."

These twins would eventually serve as each other's best man. They got engaged only two weeks apart and married just six weeks from one another.

They competed plenty as kids but, more often, teamed up. Brandon was always the better athlete. Yet, to this day, the only thing that really bothers Jason is the fact that Brandon, despite being an inch shorter, was the one who could dunk a basketball.

Brandon now calls the six months of chemotherapy and six weeks of radiation that followed his "cancer journey." He phoned his twin brother after every treatment, reassuring Jason that things would work out, the patient also the healer.

As a former college quarterback evolved into an NFL defensive coordinator, Brandon has been touted for his ability to see football from both sides. His vision goes even deeper than that.

"I looked at it as a chance to compete," Brandon said of his diagnosis. "It was a chance that could really bring out all the best in me. When you get to the other side of it, there's an energy, there's a strength, there's a feeling that you can do anything that you dream of. That's what I've been trying to do every day since."

And now, he's the Chargers' head coach, a young, sharp leader ready to pair with Justin Herbert, the team's young, sharp quarterback.

Brandon's first call after accepting the job was to his wife, Amy. His second was to Herbert.

On the day he was introduced by the Chargers, Brandon called Herbert again, this time for a video chat, explaining later that he wanted to loop in his quarterback as a way of gaining Herbert's trust.

The call included not only Brandon but also Amy and couple's three young sons — Colin, Will and Grant.

"That meant a lot to me," Herbert said. "He had so many other things to do that day. To set aside some time like that was special. I thought that was a pretty cool moment."

They talked family and relationships before they talked football, this disciple of Vic Fangio leaning instead on the lessons from home, the lessons taught by his most favorite of teachers.

At the Perry Cemetery, a family friend recently hung a Chargers lanyard over Linda's gravestone and sent the twins a photo.

Thinking back to his mother, Brandon said, "She's not here, but she's with me."

And that won't change anytime soon, not for someone who comes from a coaching tree carved from his family tree.

A brother's promise and the D-II season that led Brandon Staley to the Chargers

By Daniel Popper
The Athletic
March 23, 2021

Mitch Phillis was still learning, and like any 19-year-old college sophomore, he had questions. But he was afraid of asking a dumb one to his superior — in this case, his football coach.

Phillis had taken over as Division II Mercyhurst College's starting quarterback four games into the 2005 season. He was developing, there was no doubt about that. But his coach was demanding, and Phillis did not want to mar his progress with public embarrassment. So in the film room, as his coach toggled through cut-ups of an exotic defensive coverage, Phillis bit his tongue.

Luckily, he had a human answer key sitting next to him: Brandon Staley, a fifth-year grad transfer backup quarterback who, despite being only 22, already was an encyclopedia of football schematics. The film session would wrap up, and later, Phillis would find Staley in the locker room to ask the questions that had been eating at him. Staley would happily oblige: It was a split coverage, of course. Man on one side, zone on the other.

Problem solved. Embarrassment avoided.

Fifteen years before he was hired to lead the Los Angeles Chargers, Staley's remarkable capacity for teaching, distilling and communicating information already was there — it just had to be uncovered. He had started two games earlier in the fall while Phillis dealt with a training camp injury, but once Phillis was healthy, he returned under center, and Staley was faced with the finality of his playing career.

Instead of wallowing, though, Staley did what was natural, what he always was destined to do.

"He just started coaching," says his twin brother Jason.

Jason Staley was ready to break up with football. His mother, Linda, died on Valentine's Day in 2004 after a long battle with breast cancer. "She approached just a truly awful disease with an amount of grace that is really hard to put into words," Jason said.

Jason, a linebacker, spent the 2004 season at Mercyhurst that fall, but he had lost his desire to keep playing.

"I hit the point where I loved football but I wasn't in love with football anymore," he said. "That's a tough realization because you've been playing the game since you were 6. It's even tougher to make the decision to walk away."

Jason was done, and he told his brother, his "best friend" who had just finished his second winning season as Dayton's starting quarterback and who, like Jason, had one more year of eligibility

But his brother was having none of it. Brandon knew Jason would regret giving up that final season for the rest of his life. So he offered a solution.

"I'll come play with you," Brandon said.

"Excuse me?" Jason replied in shock.

Brandon could have stayed at Dayton. But the brothers, inseparable from birth, had spent the last four years apart. They were still grieving for their mother, a sixth-grade English teacher who had instilled in them the value of work ethic and empathy. Brandon wanted to be there for his twin. And so they decided to spend this final season at Mercyhurst, together.

Brandon graduated from Dayton in May. He was in Erie, Pa., days later, moving in with his brother for the first time since they were 18. Brandon picked up a summer job moving furniture around campus. And he picked up Mercyhurst's hefty playbook, literally and figuratively.

The first time Phillis sat down to watch film with Staley, he was surprised to realize the newcomer already had learned the Lakers' intricate pro-style offense.

"We did not have anybody like him," Jason said.

That was evident within days — in the weight room, on the field, in the film room.

"I probably learned more in that summer about studying opponents than I had in the prior four years combined," said John Egbert, a receiver on that 2005 team. "And it just really was evident that he was a different level of cat."

Brandon was instrumental in organizing regular 7-on-7 games between the Mercyhurst offense and defense, what Egbert described as "epic, epic duels" every Sunday. Those days were transformative for the whole team.

"A lot of competition," said Jeff Nowling, who entered 2005 as the starting quarterback. "A lot of jawing at one another."

Because most of the players grew up locally, those not staying on campus drove to Erie for those scrimmages, including Phillis, who came to a sudden realization about Brandon.

"This guy's been getting after it," Phillis said. "He knows the offense already. He's been working on that. He's not coming into camp, like, oh, I'll learn it in camp. He was someone that was like, I'm going to know this before camp, and he was on it."

Brandon galvanized the team to train harder and more frequently. He threw every day with teammates.

The day Brandon got to the Mercyhurst football office, Egbert walked into the weight room and saw his new teammate doing Olympic lifts with a barbell while balancing on one leg. Egbert looked on in bewilderment. What are you doing over there?

The previous summer, before Brandon's arrival, Egbert thought he had made dramatic strides through his workouts.

"We probably did half the amount of work that we did the summer that Brandon came in," Egbert said.

Trying to find any way to get on the field, Brandon took reps at safety during those 7-on-7 games to sharpen his defensive versatility. He had only ever played quarterback.

"He could play any position," Nowling said. "He was very athletic."

Brandon still spent enough time in the playbook to grasp the complex offense at warp speed.

"I remember within a week or two," Egbert said, "not only was he teaching concepts to the other QBs who had been in the room for one, two or in some cases three years, some of the offensive assistants, like our wide receivers coach, he was teaching things to."

Brandon Zangaro, a two-way player on that 2005 team, was not in Erie for the summer. When he arrived for the start of training camp, Brandon Staley had already mastered far more than just the quarterback's duties. He knew the responsibilities of every player on the field.

"You know his intelligence and his Xs and Os are next level within the first 30 seconds of speaking with him," Zangaro said. "You have a guy transferring in, there's going to be some skepticism. Who's this guy? He hasn't been here the past four years doing what we've all been doing. But that didn't happen, because everybody knew."

Including Joe Lombardi.

Lombardi joined the Mercyhurst staff in 2002 when Marty Schaezle took over as head coach. And though he was coaching at a small Division II liberal arts school, Lombardi, the grandson of legend Vince Lombardi, still had Super Bowl expectations.

"Every day, every week, it seemed like he thought he was in the NFL," Egbert said. "I think in his mind he was walking out to Heinz Field instead of Tullio Field in Erie, Pennsylvania."

Lombardi demanded perfect recall. He ran Bill Walsh-inspired perfect-play drills to end practice, where one minor misstep — like running a route at 14 yards of depth instead of 15 yards — required another repetition. He scripted his first 20 plays every game when no one in Division II was implementing that level of preparation.

One day at practice, Lombardi watched a play unfold that reminded him of a film clip he showed his team two months prior. He asked Phillis if he remembered it — well, more like demanded if he remembered it.

(This might explain why Phillis would go to Staley with his questions.)

"I was kind of like, 'Ummm, I don't remember that specific play,'" Phillis remembers. "He was the type that was like, 'How could you not remember that? If you see it once, you should know it forever.'"

Thinking back, Egbert still marvels at Lombardi's attention to detail.

"Football is in his blood," Egbert added. "But honestly, there's more football in his brain than in his blood."

Staley, meanwhile, was enthralled. The two football junkies connected almost immediately.

"I really fell in love with studying the game," Staley said of his time with Lombardi at Mercyhurst. "I felt like Joe was an outstanding teacher. I felt like he was really progressive at that time. I had never been around an offense like that, that really challenged the quarterback from a mental standpoint, from a preparation standpoint."

"I love that. I couldn't get enough of it."

Specifically, Lombardi offered a diverse and layered NFL-inspired playbook that differed from the option-heavy offense Staley ran at Dayton. The quarterback had much more control at the line of scrimmage, sometimes having as many as 20 possible audibles or checks at his disposal.

"He was always trying to learn," Nowling said of Staley. "He wanted to eat it up. So he asked a million questions. ... Brandon's questions sparked a different thought in Coach Lombardi."

"The way that Joe talked to Brandon, he knew he could put more on him than other guys," Egbert said. "He would feed him more, he would pick his brain more. He talked to him more as a peer than a player because he really respected his knowledge."

The connection grew over that season, and Lombardi trusted Staley's understanding of the offense. That formed an avenue to the field for Staley. With Phillis injured, Staley replaced Nowling, the starter, in the second half of the season opener with the Lakers trailing, 28-10, to Gannon. He led an early second-half touchdown drive, but four fourth-quarter turnovers prevented a comeback.

The following week, Staley entered for Nowling in the second quarter against Northern Michigan. He helped erase a five-point deficit, and Mercyhurst took its first lead of the season. But turnovers, again, were the culprit in a loss. Staley started the next week and nearly led the Lakers to a win over 18th-ranked Michigan Tech. He gained over 100 yards on the ground and threw for 192 yards, a touchdown and two interceptions.

Phillis then replaced Staley in the fourth quarter the following week with Mercyhurst trailing Northwood, 35-0. Staley's final snaps at quarterback came two weeks later in relief of Phillis against Ashland. Staley took snaps at quarterback in five of the first six games of the season. The Lakers went 0-7 to start the year. They had a young defense that gave up at least 40 points in seven of 10 games the season.

But the Staley-Lombardi relationship was a bright spot in the disappointment. Staley had earned that trust over the course of that season, in the film room and on the practice field, even after he lost the starting job for the second time.

"Brandon was just there," Jason said. "He showed up to every practice and soaked up everything from Coach Lombardi. It was like hell trying to stop him. ... He really knew he wanted to go into coaching after interacting with Coach Lombardi."

In 2009, when Staley was an assistant at Division III St. Thomas, he traveled to New Orleans to visit with Lombardi, then the Saints quarterbacks coach. Staley embedded in the Saints QB room for a week with Lombardi and Drew Brees. Lombardi long had been an advocate for Staley in NFL coaching circles, including with Ed Donatell, with whom Lombardi coached on the Falcons staff in 2006. Staley ended up getting his first NFL gig as the outside linebackers coach for the Bears in 2017 with Vic Fangio, and Donatell, a longtime Fangio assistant, was on that staff.

"He really taught me the game at a high level," Staley said of Lombardi. "Protections, the run game, how do these concepts fit together, how can we get in and out of plays. At that time, that's kind of where my love for coaching offensive football really came, was from him, because I loved playing for him and I learned so much and he made me better. And I think that we saw the game the same way, and that relationship has really stood the test of time."

"They were really good memories," Lombardi said. "He was awfully smart and fun to be around."

Staley's decision to play with his brother in turn helped facilitate the relationship that led to perhaps the most important hire of his life.

Justin Herbert's development is a priority as the Chargers enter a pivotal offseason. That responsibility will fall largely on the shoulders of his offensive coordinator: Joe Lombardi.

"There are so many coaching trees built up and circles crossing, and you hear about people hiring people they know all the time," Egbert said. "But this does seem unique, doesn't it?"

Zangaro broke his leg midway through the 2005 season and had a front row seat to Staley's transformation.

He watched practice as the backup quarterback, completely comfortable in his teaching role, groomed Phillis and connected with his teammates.

Staley was finding his coaching voice.

"He's got it. He's just got it," Zangaro remembered thinking at that moment. "The way that he communicates and his ability to communicate with different people at different levels, it was unparalleled."

Phillis' growth was most evident. And Zangaro, from his sideline seat, knew Staley played a crucial part.

Phillis, a self-proclaimed pocket passer, even scored a rushing touchdown that season when he pump-faked a linebacker and dove over the goal line. He said he picked up the move from watching Staley in training camp.

As Zangaro thinks back now, he witnessed a man born to coach football embarking on a journey that would carry him to the very pinnacle of the professional.

"You knew what he was going to do," Zangaro said, "and where he was going to go."

Brandon Staley Q&A: Chargers coach on developing player relationships, Justin Herbert, OTAs install and more

By Jourdan Rodrigue

OCEANSIDE, Calif. — Brandon Staley couldn't keep still.

The Los Angeles Chargers' head coach — hired away from the Rams in January and preparing to open his first NFL training camp in that role — stopped for a day at the QB Collective coaching and quarterback summit in Oceanside as the event's keynote speaker and to help facilitate an ongoing dialogue about scheme, philosophy and trends among several competing NFL coaches.

As the event unfolded Saturday morning, some coaches, including 49ers offensive coordinator Mike McDaniel, 49ers quarterbacks coach Rich Scangarello and Chargers defensive coordinator Renaldo Hill, sat around a large wooden table and dissected the merits of 49ers head coach Kyle Shanahan's offensive system and how it juxtaposes to and clashes schematically with Staley's defensive system — itself a mad scientist-escaped-from-the-laboratory amalgamation of Broncos defensive coordinator Vic Fangio's system. A dozen other coaches and league personnel sat on couches that were set up around the perimeter of the table, joining in the conversation and occasionally scribbling notes.

The young quarterbacks in the room stared wide-eyed at the coaches, their eyes darting back to Staley, who paced and gestured at the front of the room as he spoke about his background and offered advice on a player's journey to the NFL as well as a coach's. When the teaching portion ended and the quarterbacks left, film was turned on and the real chatter among the coaches began. The dialogue was respectful but rippled with electricity as they watched cut-ups of their teams clashing on a large screen positioned at the head of the table. Staley moved to one of the couches but would hop up to the table when the conversation got juicy, unable to help himself from quite literally jumping into the ideas presented.

That, as it turned out, was only the first part of his weekend. He also swung by a seven-on-seven tournament in Long Beach the next day. The Athletic caught up with him in between events to see how his first offseason as a head coach has gone, how he's developing relationships with his players — including, of course, collaborating with second-year quarterback Justin Herbert, the reigning NFL rookie of the year — what his approach to installing his plan in spring workouts has been and how he has set about planting the first seeds of his coaching philosophy as the Chargers prepare for camp on July 27.

Note: This conversation has been lightly edited for length and clarity.

You're about to jump into it. I know you've been preparing, and you had the draft and spring ball, but this is where it starts to get into the real year. Does it feel that way to you?

I think, from a head coaching perspective, that scheduling is really a big part of the job. I think that knowing how far in front of these things you have to be, from a planning and really from a performance standpoint — like some of these nontraditional weeks where you're going from a Sunday to a Thursday, a Sunday to a Monday, coming off a bye week, going into a bye week — some of that long-term planning and working with our coaching staff and our sports performance team and our personnel department, I think that makes you feel like, "Hey, this is coming. This is happening."

I pour a lot of time and energy into that because I want our players to know the reason behind everything we do. I feel like I put a lot of time and effort into organizing schedules, whether it's practice or installation or training camp — or some of these travel schedules, (like) going from a Pacific to an East Coast time slot where it's a 10 a.m. start time — and putting a lot of energy into that. That's been a big part of making it feel real. You're making these schedules because it's coming fast.

From a microscopic point of view, which is how I prefer to think about it, it's just about getting training camp off the ground. That's what's coming first. That's been a lot of fun for me. I feel like that's a sweet spot for me because I like being able to build things. That's been exciting.

What are a couple of moments in which you've started to see the building blocks you're stacking?

You know, over the summer, (safety) Derwin James had his first child. You know the depth of the relationship you have with him when he sends you the picture of that baby boy from the hospital. And at the same time, he's watching Washington Football Team film against the Rams! And, you know, asking questions about our game plan and what he's seeing on tape from them — while he's in the hospital. I think that shows you're maybe doing something right.

Just being able to connect with (receiver) Keenan Allen at the U.S. Open. I brought my brother in from Pittsburgh — he had just been named a partner at his firm — and so I surprised him with a trip out here to go to the third round of the U.S. Open. And being able to connect with Keenan at the tournament and walk the course with him and my twin brother, I think you have a strong sense of where you stand with a guy like that — how he has accepted you and where his frame of mind is — a guy who is one of the premier players in the game. Just so excited to compete with him. I feel like, in just a short amount of time, we've been able to get really close. Those are the things that I really, really enjoy.

With relationship-building being such a huge part of what you're doing now, how do you do that authentically?

I think you just do it slowly. I think you do it daily. I don't think it's ever one big moment, just a lot of little moments. I think it's just acknowledging everybody that you see and the small conversations that let everybody know that you're aware of them and who they are and listening to them.

We had Austin Proehl, who we signed (after the draft) from North Carolina, who is best friends with Mitch Trubisky (who Staley knew during his time in Chicago as an outside linebackers coach), who is from where I'm from in Ohio, and valuing him the same way that I do Keenan Allen and getting to know him. (Center) Corey Linsley, he had a baby a couple of weeks ago back in Columbus, and he was able to come back and forth during the spring. (His wife) Anna and my wife kind of got to know each other. So, you do the best you can with everybody and know that each relationship is different; it has a life of its own. And all you can do is make sure that you do the best you can with all of the people that you're with and knowing that they're all different. And the more you get to know them, you'll know how much or how little of a relationship you'll have with them. It can't be the same with everybody. ... But the fact that you have one is what's most important to me.

Really, I think (you can) learn a lot through your coaching staff. Your coaching staff can have a more intimate view of their position group. ... It's daily. That's a big part of your role as the head coach is to have the pulse of your team — not only your players but your coaching staff. It takes a lot of investment, and I'm sort of built for that. That's what I really like to do.

I even heard that offensive line coach Frank Smith moved his office so it's like an entry and exit point of the building for the linemen.

Yeah, we want to live the mission. We talk about "our way" being relationships and competition, and if that's going to be at the forefront of everything that we do, then each individual coach in their own way has to make that a big part of their own mission statement. I think why Frank is a special coach is that he understands how to connect with his guys. He understands what a dynamic group an O-line room is and how different all of these personalities are. And the best way that you can connect with people is being available — a great way to be available is to be with them.

Frank knows that sometimes when a player comes upstairs to a coach's office, he feels differently than when he's downstairs in a meeting room. It feels like a more welcoming environment where (they) can be themselves; (they) don't have to be sort of a manufactured self. You see that a lot in the NFL; people are putting on a front — they're playing a part in a movie — they're not necessarily being their authentic, full self. I think what (Frank) has done with our group is open himself up, and I think by doing that, it's opened them up. Now our lines of communication are open in a way that wouldn't be possible if he were upstairs all the time. They can stay later with him; they can come earlier. He has a central command center down there for them and with (assistant offensive line coach) Shaun Sarrett, and I think it's Frank's way of making the relationship part really big.

Do you think that helps, having multiple spaces like that where guys can just be around each other, learn about each other, understand each other — not just player to player but coach to player?

Yeah, and that's why I tell our coaches to go work out when the players are working out. I was like, "You'll be surprised what you can find out from observing them or being a part of a workout session where you can maybe talk about something just briefly that will end up helping your day out." I think a lot of people look down on that or laugh at me, turn their nose up, whatever. There's a lot of cynical people out there. What I encouraged our staff to do is to be around our guys if they're into what we're doing. ... If we can always stay current with them, then we're going to create a lot of solutions to these really tough problems that we're going to have. I don't believe in coaches hanging out together all day. I know that's not the way. The way is to be around your players as much as they can, and our coaches have kind of given life to that.

I shared a bunch of stories about when I was with (Rams star cornerback Jalen) Ramsey. I made a 90-play cut-up last March of him, from Florida State all the way to the 2019 Rams: good plays, bad plays, in the middle, press, off, tackling, effort, leadership stuff, his role for the Rams. On two hours, on a Zoom call in the beginning of the pandemic, that's where it started for us, because he knew that I was invested in his game. I shared with him, I said, "I don't think that I would be here without Jalen Ramsey." And it was a moment like that that led to a lot of other really big and small moments along the way that allowed him and us to have a great year — that let him know that you're thinking about him, that it's personal. I don't see how you can do this job if you don't make it personal. (Voice raises.) I just don't, Jourdan. I don't see how you can do it well.

I remember how collaborative your relationship with Jalen was, too.

I use that word — "express themselves" — because I mean it. It's a partnership. That's why I love the NFL. You have to make sure that that guy has a big voice in how you do things, because he can help you. He can see a lot of things that are happening out there that can really help you. You can say, "Hey, we can do this one of two ways." And then he makes the way that he wants work. We're always going to be wired that way. "We've got two really good solutions. What are you more comfortable with?"

I just think that's the best way to do business. And then you're always current during the week, and then when you get to the signal caller meetings that he and I had all the time, they were like quarterback meetings where he's ranking the third downs. "Hey, these are the coverages I like the best. This is where I want to be in the red area." So he's fully aware of why we're doing everything and there's no surprises for him on game day. I think that collaboration is ultimately why we had the year that we had. He had a huge impact on me.

And I want to tie that thread over to the other side because of your quarterback. If we're tying thread together, translating that type of collaboration over to Herbert, I imagine that's the most important thing you two can do is to collaborate in that manner.

A big part of it is that I know our offense. I know how we call things, I know why we call them that way, from a formation standpoint to a protection standpoint to a route concept standpoint, so I can speak his language on a day-to-day basis. And then, I feel like a big contribution from me is to help him identify defenses and how people play and what their rules are. "These are the personnel groupings that they play. These are their fronts they play, the coverages they play, the pressure packages they have. Here's a couple defenders who can tell you what's happening. Here's why it's happening." And offer him that second part of his education where, yeah, he's learning it from Joe (Lombardi) and Shane (Day). But I'm the checks and balances that offers him that other perspective — and a fresh perspective. And I think that with Justin, it's: "Do you prepare the path for the player or the player for the path?" And I want to prepare the player for the path, not the path for the player.

I don't want to make it easy for Justin; I want to make it right for him. And so on the front end, I'll say, "Hey, man, we're going to challenge you. We're going to push you." Because ultimately, I know that for us to be as good as we can be, (he) has to be the one running the show for us. And (him) just knowing that, as his head coach, I have his back and we're going to work through it during the week together and hopefully I can give him that full perspective where he can become a complete player.

When you guys talk, how do you talk to each other?

A lot of it is keeping it light, talking about our day to day. And I think that's where it starts: from a personal perspective. From a ball perspective. Just asking a lot of questions and being a part of the conversation and the dialogue. And he knows that my door is open and my cellphone is on for all of those things that come up for him. I think everyone wants to make it this big thing, but that's not how it is; they're little things. Little things that add up to the big things, and ultimately, that's where you know you trust one another — when it's not like (you're only reaching out over) big stuff. It's small stuff that happens over time.

I think, over the course of OTAs, what was awesome was being able to be in all of those quarterback meetings. I felt like Justin got a lot better. I felt like he learned a lot more about not only our offense but our defense. I could say, "Hey, this is why, offensively, we really like this. This is why we do this, because it's really good against this." When you can speak that part of the language, it's not like you're some sort of "defensive coach." You're just his coach. Right? And I think that's just a goal of mine was to establish, "I'm a coach. Not just a defensive coach." I'm his coach, just like I'm Derwin James' coach. And I've really enjoyed that.

Which phase of the on-field "building" process are you in right now?

We talked about in the springtime really trying to push it from an installation standpoint, to really introduce our football scheme, our technique and our situational foundation. What we wanted to do was teach our guys a lot of football and install a lot. We were not going full speed, so what we did was we two-spotted the field so that everybody on the team could be working. That was done intentionally so that everybody was developing. Not just part of the team; the whole team was developing. We didn't have to worry about the full speed of 11-on-11, the full speed of that, the anxiety, not to mention the health and safety stuff. What we were able to do was really install a lot more offense and defense. ... There's a lot of information that they're responsible for, so they have to come to the facility ready. They're responsible for a lot. So in a traditional OTA (practice), they may get 10 to 15 plays. Well, they were getting 65 to 75 plays that they were having to operate against a great offense or defense. If you just do the math on that, you're getting five times as many snaps every day.

On the front end, it was a lot harder for our players because we ended up installing as much defense as we had for the Green Bay playoff game (with the Rams). We ended up installing that much. But what it did was it introduced our players to what we do and why we do it. I think that our players, although it was challenging for them, they benefited greatly because now when it goes live in training camp, they know what to do because they've done it. There isn't anything they have not been exposed to from a baseline of installation, because at the end of the day, you just want these guys to be able to perform their best and express themselves, and then for you as a coaching staff to figure out what everyone is best at. We were able to establish our way of playing, and our guys are going to feel very confident in operating our systems in all three phases because we put a lot of stuff in. It wasn't smothering or overwhelming because the physical part wasn't a part of the equation. I felt like I got really good feedback from the players because we engineered this as a coaching staff first and then went to our (player) leadership council (about it).

As you saw last year with the Rams, I feel like we spent a lot of time thinking about how to build things. Like, a lot of time. Like, way more time than you could ever imagine. And I feel like that's why it usually works out OK. I think if you build things properly, you're going to be more prepared for all of the things you're going to (experience) in the league.

Mom's influence inspires ex-Flyer's meteoric rise to NFL head coach

*By Tom Archdeacon Dayton Daily News
January 24, 2021*

The Dayton Flyers — who'd been on a 14-game winning streak — had suffered a heartbreaking, 33-28 loss to Valparaiso at Welcome Stadium.

Brandon Staley, UD's option quarterback, had thrown for 280 yards and two touchdowns, ran for 86 yards and another score and nearly orchestrated the comeback when he drove the Flyers the length of the field in the final minutes, only to have four straight passes fall incomplete in the end zone.

After the game, he had gone around the dressing room consoling several of his teammates, but before he would talk to me he said he had to step outside to make a phone call.

As he did after every game in that 2003 football season, Staley called his mom, Linda, who was back home in their small Lake County town of Perry.

She was too ill to be at the game, but as she'd tell me that evening when we spoke, listening to the radio broadcast of the Flyers' game and especially hearing her son's voice afterward was "some of the best medicine I can get now."

A longtime English teacher, she'd been diagnosed nine years earlier with breast cancer and by that late October game things had gotten "pretty tough" for her Brandon said.

Linda didn't hold back when we spoke.

"I had three chemo treatments a week ago and I feel OK, but I don't have much energy now," she said quietly. "My cancer has metastasized to my liver and I know it's kind of scary for my boys now. They know it can be brutal.

"But Brandon knows how much I look forward to Saturdays: Listening to what he's doing out there on the field, hearing them say his name, knowing he's on the Dean's List at school, it makes me so proud.

"Saturdays I have a smile on my face."

Less than four months later — on Valentine's Day 2004 — Linda Staley passed away. She was just 46 and left three sons and Bruce, her husband of 23 years. After that emotional call back home following the Valpo game, Brandon had talked about his mom:

"You could never tell what she's fighting through because... she never gives in, never gives up."

"I draw on her strength every day. She's my inspiration."

Now, fast forward 17 years and 3 months to this past Thursday afternoon, and you heard Staley say almost the exact same thing about his mom when the Los Angeles Chargers formerly introduced him at press conference as their next head coach.

"She was an inspiration to me as a player and she is an inspiration to me as a coach and as a father and as a husband," he said on the Zoom call. "There's no possible way I would be here if it weren't for her."

Many football observers were surprised by what some called the "meteoric rise" of the 38-year-old coach. He has been in the NFL just four years. Five years ago he was an assistant coach at John Carroll University, the Division III school on Cleveland's east side.

Before he was hired last Sunday to replace Anthony Lynn, he'd never been a head coach at any level.

The Chargers interviewed five other candidates, but Staley – who had spent the past season as the defensive coordinator on Sean McVay's Los Angeles Rams staff and made the defense No. 1 in the NFL – was impressive in their interviews, said John Spanos, the president of football operations:

"He's the son of a teacher and he's the son of a coach. One of my favorite parts of the first time we sat down with Coach Staley was when he said, 'People ask me what coaching tree I consider myself a part of.'

"This is a guy who coached with some great minds in football. He worked with Vic Fangio. He coached with Sean McVay. But he says, 'I'm part of the Bruce and Linda Staley coaching tree. That's my coaching tree.'

"And I think that says a lot about Brandon. It says a lot about his character, his values and who he is."

Back in 2003, Linda talked to me about football and her family: "Football is important to our whole family. Actually, we're pretty nuts about it."

That October day had been proof. While Linda was at home, Bruce was at Mercyhurst College where Brandon's twin brother Jason was a linebacker. It was Parents Weekend so he belonged there, but he wanted to know everything that was happening with Brandon, too.

"My husband and I had a phone call going and when Dayton was on offense, I'd hold my phone up to the Internet broadcast so Bruce could listen on his cell phone," she laughed. "I got pretty animated, so I don't know what he actually heard."

That spunk his mom showed that day was something Brandon would draw on four years later – in 2007 – when he was a grad assistant at Northern Illinois and a grapefruit-sized tumor was found on his right lung. By then he'd lost his mom and aunt to breast cancer and his high school coach to the disease as well, but his dad had overcome thyroid cancer and would do the same (recently) with prostate cancer.

Brandon was diagnosed with lymphoma and when the season ended he returned to Cleveland to undergo chemotherapy. He returned to NIU for spring football, then went back home to finish his six months of chemo.

When the next season began, he drove regularly to Chicago for six weeks of radiation.

His scheduled his treatments at 7 a.m. so he could get back to campus in time for afternoon practice.

"When I went through my cancer journey...I thought of it as a chance to really bring out the best in me," he said Thursday. "I think when you get to the other side of it, there is an energy, a strength. There is a feeling you can do anything you dream of."

"And that's just what I've been trying to do every day since."

'I never would have been able to do it alone'

"He's what I'd call a typical Dayton Flyers football player," said Mike Kelly, who was UD's celebrated head coach back then and today is an assistant athletics director at the school. "He came from a smaller school, was multi-talented and an outstanding student."

After a stellar career at Perry High School, he was redshirted his first year at UD and the following season he was a backup. Finally, in his third year – that 2003 season – Staley won the starting job and guided the Flyers through a 9-2 campaign.

In 2004, the Flyers had added Kevin Hoyng from Coldwater. He'd go on to become the program's all-time leader in career passing yards completions and touchdowns, but that season he and Staley split the starting duties. Although he graduated after that season, Staley still has a year of eligibility left.

"He knew he was going to be in a serious battle with Kevin, but we probably would have played both of them again," Kelly said. "Like any young man, he wanted the spot himself, but we couldn't guarantee that."

He decided to transfer to Mercyhurst, whose quarterbacks' coach was former Flyers assistant Joe Lombardi, now the QB coach of the New Orleans Saints.

It hadn't been easy for Staley to leave Dayton, especially because of the way people reached out to him when his mom died.

"We brought two busloads of players – maybe 50 or 60 guys – up to the funeral," Kelly said. "It was a very emotional time for Brandon and his family."

Staley reflected on that Thursday: "I never would have been able to do it alone."

But in going to Mercyhurst, he became the starting quarterback, got to play with his brother and was a lot closer to his dad since Perry was just 70 minutes away from the Erie, Pa. campus.

His dad had been a longtime high school coach and that's something that always intrigued Brandon.

"I started drinking coffee in the first grade and reading the sports page," he laughed. "I wanted to be just like my dad."

'The best teacher I've ever seen'

During spring football drills in 2003, Staley registered the highest vertical jump on the UD team. And in landing now with the Chargers, it's evident he hasn't lost his hops as a coach.

"I've been around for three decades coaching and every once in a while a young, bright guy who sees the game globally comes around," Ed Donatell, the Denver Broncos defensive coordinator and a two-time Super Bowl winner, told the Denver Post. "(Staley) sees offense, defense, special teams and he knows how they work ... It's an extraordinary job of teaching (to get the Rams defense atop the NFL.) He's a young, bright mind that sees it all and can communicate with people."

After starting out as a defensive assistant at Northern Illinois, Staley became a defensive line and special teams coach at D-III St. Thomas University in Minnesota, then spent two seasons at Hutchinson Community College in Kansas and year as a grad assistant at Tennessee.

In 2013 he was hired as the defensive coordinator at John Carroll. He made a one-season detour to James Madison, then returned to John Carroll. In 2016, he planned to join JCU coach Tom Arth at Tennessee-Chattanooga when Vic Fangio of the Chicago Bears called.

Two seasons later he followed Fangio to Denver and last season he was hired by McVay, whose granddad, John McVay, had been the Flyers coach for eight seasons in the 1960s and '70s and later, as San Francisco's VP and director of football operations, helped lead the 49ers to five Super Bowl titles.

"I hardly know anything about professional football, but what amazes me is it's such a tight knit group of people," Kelly said. "There's a lot of networking."

And the Dayton Flyers are now a part of that network. When he was 30, Sean McVay – who went to Ascension School in Kettering – became the youngest head coach ever in the NFL. At 33, he was the youngest Super Bowl coach.

Part of his grandpa's staff at UD was Jim Gruden, whose son Jon would be a back-up quarterback for Kelly's UD teams in the 1980s and later won the Super Bowl as the Tampa Bay Buccaneers coach. He now coaches of the Las Vegas Raiders. Before him, Chuck Noll, the former Flyers lineman of the 1950s, won four Super Bowls as the Pittsburgh Steelers head coach and is enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

Jon Gruden now has Austin King, a former Flyers assistant, on his staff. And this evening former Flyers' center Terry Heffernan will help coach the Buffalo Bills line in the AFC title game against Kansas City.

Thursday somebody noted to Staley that he'd now be facing fellow Flyer Gruden twice a year in the AFC West. While he praised Gruden – "he's as good of a football coach as there is" – he also got in a puckish tweak: "We were both quarterbacks at Dayton, but I'll tell you that I was a little better quarterback than he was."

The Chargers hired him because of the way they believe he'll relate to his players and Staley was quick to give props to his mom for that:

"She was the best teacher I've ever seen. She had an amazing ability to listen. People just felt they could be themselves with her. She could really bring out the best in them ... I think seeing that up close when I was a kid, I saw the power in that. And certainly I've tried to embody a lot of that now as a coach.

"So even though my mom's not here, she's with me."

Once he lifted her. Now she lifts him.

Los Angeles Chargers' new coach Staley played quarterback for Mercyhurst University

By Mike Copper
Erie Times-News
January 23, 2021

Mercyhurst University football coach Marty Schaeztle likes to have his former players speak to current ones.

Schaeztle, who's run the Lakers' program since 2002, said it provides them a sense of what's possible to achieve once their playing days are done.

Brandon Staley, a quarterback for the 2005 Lakers, was among those who talked via teleconference to members of the 2020 team last spring.

Staley did so as the then-new defensive coordinator for coach Sean McVay of the Los Angeles Rams.

"It was nice for the players to hear about the challenges Brandon was having with COVID-19, while at the same time trying to install a defense around All-Pros like (Aaron) Donald and (Jalen) Ramsey," Schaeztle said. "I liked it because I think he realized we (Mercyhurst's coaches) were having the same sort of issues. I know our players certainly appreciated hearing him on that call."

The Lakers didn't know it at the time, but they were conversing with the same Brandon Staley who would go on to be hired by the Los Angeles Chargers as their new head coach last week. He'll take over SoFi Stadium's other NFL tenant as he leaves the Rams.

Schaeztle said he texted Staley, who turned 38 last month, throughout the Rams' 2020 season, which ended with their loss at Green Bay during last weekend's NFC divisional playoff round.

Schaeztle does hope to speak with Staley once the Perry, Ohio, native is better situated in his new job.

"This is exciting for our whole program," Schaeztle said, "but I think the most fun for me has been to see Brandon's former teammates being excited for him on social media. He played with a special group of athletes on the 2005 team. The seniors were part of my first (recruiting) class. They've all been very successful in their professions, and this is just another guy doing a great job in his profession."

Staley takes over for Anthony Lynn, whom the Chargers fired after they missed the playoffs their past two seasons. However, they seem positioned to have a better future based on the 2020 performance of rookie quarterback Justin Herbert, who set numerous NFL rookie passing records.

Staley's background could benefit Herbert, the sixth overall pick in last year's NFL draft.

Road to Mercyhurst

Staley played for Dayton (Ohio) University, where he started at quarterback for the Division I Flyers in 2003-04. He had one season of eligibility left when he graduated and, knowing twin brother Jason also had one season left with the Mercyhurst football team, joined the roster as a graduate student.

The Lakers, then members of the former Great Lakes Intercollegiate Athletic Conference, finished 2005 at 3-7 overall. Their losing record was due in part to a rash of injuries that included starting quarterback Mitch Phillis.

Staley dutifully filled in behind center when needed. He passed for 744 yards and six touchdowns and ran for another 173 and one score.

"The greatest thing he did that year was he came in on a team with fourth-year seniors," Schaeztle said. "They had something among themselves, but Brandon managed to fit in immediately. He understood the big picture, with some help from Jason. He amazed everybody."

"That's when I could tell he could do very well in (the coaching) profession because he knew about relationships."

Illness and adversity

Staley has gone from backup quarterback at a Division II program to NFL head coach before the age of 40.

While Staley's ascension was relatively swift, it wasn't without personal adversity.

Cancer has been an ominous presence throughout most of Staley's life. His mother, Linda, died from breast cancer in 2004 and his father, Bruce, recently recovered from prostate cancer.

Brandon Staley also is a cancer survivor. He was a graduate assistant at Northern Illinois in 2006, the year after he played for Mercyhurst, when he was diagnosed with Hodgkin's lymphoma.

Staley discussed his family's plight during the Chargers' news conference Thursday.

"When I went through my own cancer journey, six months of radiation, I looked at it as a chance to compete," he said. "I thought it was a chance that could really bring out all the best in me. I think when you get to the other side of it, there's an energy. There's a strength. There's a feeling that you can do anything that you dream of, and that's what I've been trying to do."

Staley's initiative saw him rise from Division III assistant to NFL head coach in five years. He was the defensive coordinator for Ohio's John Carroll University when he was hired to coach the outside linebackers for the 2017 Chicago Bears.

Staley held that same position with the 2019 Denver Broncos. Despite the small coaching sample size, McVay heard enough talk and saw enough game video to hire him as the Rams' defensive coordinator for this past season.

Under Staley's guidance, the Rams led the NFL in total defense, passing defense and scoring defense.

Now, it's Staley who will do the hiring and fill out a staff for the 2021 Chargers.

Switching sides

Schaeztle said it's not as unusual as it sounds for someone who competed on one side of the ball as a player to excel at coaching on the other.

That Staley was a quarterback but made his rise through coaching ranks mostly on defense more plausible.

"There are certain positions in other sports, be it a point guard (in basketball) or a catcher (in baseball), where you need to understand the game as much as possible to be successful," Schaeztle said. "Playing quarterback all those years, Brandon probably built up an understanding of defenses and what gives (offenses) problems. There's no doubt that helped him, especially in his college (coaching) career."

As for Staley fulfilling his goal of becoming an NFL head coach, Schaeztle was unsure if that would happen.

But he also guessed, based on his one season at Mercyhurst, there were few reasons why it couldn't.

"Brandon was doing a very good job coaching at the Division III level," Schaeztle said, "but he made up his mind that he wanted to give coaching in the NFL a shot. Once he got in with Chicago, it didn't surprise me that he would be successful at that level. The key is always to get that break."

"Brandon had it in him because he has such passion for the game."

Los Angeles Chargers coach Brandon Staley makes sure to connect with QB Justin Herbert

New Los Angeles Chargers coach Brandon Staley made sure he didn't take too long to introduce himself to quarterback Justin Herbert, but priorities are priorities.

"I called him on my way back home," Staley said about who he contacted first when he learned Sunday that he would be the Chargers' head coach. "I promise I called [wife] Amy first, but then I called Justin because I wanted him to hear my voice. And I wanted him to know about my family ... and then I just wanted to listen for a little bit. Wanted him to hear my energy, maybe see a little bit of vision of what I have for what we want to get accomplished together."

The 38-year-old Staley said he FaceTimed with Herbert on the way to the Costa Mesa facility Thursday for the introductory news conference "because I wanted him to see us before our big day."

Staley was the coordinator for the Los Angeles Rams' top-ranked defense. And while he wouldn't go into specifics as to what he's looking for in an offensive coordinator or offensive scheme, the former college quarterback has an understanding of what it takes on both sides of the ball.

"I'm looking for somebody with character and capacity and that can lead our staff and be part of our vision for how to get the best out of our players."

Staley did say he would be making the defensive calls and hopes to have a staff in place "in a few weeks."

Chargers general manager Tom Telesco was asked why he hired a guy with so little NFL coaching experience, including zero on the offensive side.

"Having his background, coming up in high school and college on offense. I think that helps," Telesco said. "I'm watching the Baltimore and Buffalo playoff game and one coach [Sean McDermott] had a defensive background and the other [John Harbaugh] had a special-teams background. And they both have young quarterbacks and they're both doing very well."

"There are different ways to do this," said Telesco, adding that Staley's brain is "very sharp."

Chargers' new coach Staley looking to connect with Herbert

COSTA MESA, Calif. — Brandon Staley's first phone call after he accepted the Los Angeles Chargers head coaching job Sunday was to his wife, Amy. His second was to franchise quarterback Justin Herbert.

On Thursday, right before he was formally introduced as the 17th head coach in franchise history, Staley and his family video chatted with Herbert.

"You have to earn the players' trust and there's not a bigger person whose trust we need to earn than Justin's," Staley said.

The 38-year old Staley becomes a head coach after one season as the Los Angeles Rams defensive coordinator and only four years as an NFL assistant. He also fills what was considered by many to be the most attractive of the seven head coaching openings this offseason. There is plenty of talent on both sides of the ball, including Herbert, who is favored to win AP Offensive Rookie of the Year honors.

Staley replaces Anthony Lynn, who was fired on Jan. 4, two years after the Chargers reached the AFC's divisional round. Los Angeles posted two straight losing years, including 7-9 this past season.

It is also not lost on Staley that his rapid rise from being a defensive coordinator at Division III John Carroll to leading an NFL franchise in five years is a surprise.

"It doesn't make sense to a lot of people. I know that, but every day that I was coaching at John Carroll, James Madison, Hutchinson Junior College, I was envisioning going against Tom Brady or Aaron Rodgers or Russell Wilson," he said. "I was studying the NFL and trying to become as good as I could be to compete in this league, because that was always a dream of mine, and I think that those experiences have uniquely shaped me."

General manager Tom Telesco said that even though Staley might be lighter compared to others in NFL experience, his strength in other areas more than made up for it. Even though Staley has coached defense for 15 years, including 11 in college, he did play quarterback at the University of Dayton.

Telesco also said the one quality that stands out about Staley is his maturity.

"There were no buzzwords, no platitudes. It was just very to the point. A lot of substance was answered, so that really stood out," Telesco said. "You would also like to have a high level teacher and communicator. You're seeing the communication part right now. You'll see the teacher part more and when we get on the grass."

Telesco added that Staley's staff might include an assistant with head coaching experience to help in the transition.

When it comes to Staley's on-field vision, he is looking to create an offense that plays to Herbert's strengths. Herbert set a rookie record with 31 touchdown passes in 15 starts as well as having eight 300-yard games,

"We don't want to impose a system on him, but create one for him that uniquely shapes to his skill set because he is unlike anybody in the NFL, you know he's his own person," Staley said. "I think that my background as a player, my background as a defensive coach, I think that we'll be able to shape that in a really special way. I was so excited to convey in the interview, and the specifics of that were a real highlight for me."

Staley is also hoping to apply the same agility and flexibility to his defense. He said he will continue to call the defense despite being the head coach.

"I think that's what I wanted to express in the interview is that we want to put people in conflict," he said. "We want to use multiple groupings to take advantage of our players. We want to play with different tempos to put teams in a real bind. People talk about complimentary football, you know, that's how you do it is you have offense, defense, and the kicking game as mirror images of one another."

Staley is the third assistant under Rams coach Sean McVay to get an NFL head coaching job, joining Green Bay's Matt LaFleur and Cincinnati's Zac Taylor.

He was one of six candidates to interview. The Chargers also interviewed offensive coordinators Brian Daboll (Buffalo), Eric Bieniemy (Kansas City), Jason Garrett (New York Giants) and Joe Brady (Carolina), as well as Indianapolis defensive coordinator Matt Eberflus.

Telesco and Staley are hoping to fill the coaching staff within the next couple weeks. Staley was hoping to interview Rams offensive coordinator/quarterbacks coach Kevin O'Connell, but the request was blocked because it is considered a lateral move. Pep Hamilton was the Chargers quarterbacks coach this past season and has been in the running for offensive coordinator openings throughout the league.

Brandon Staley, Chargers coach? Those who know him know why he 'skyrocketed' to top

By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
January 18, 2021

To understand how quickly Brandon Staley reached the status of Chargers coach, consider this:

The team has been in Los Angeles longer than he has been in the NFL.

Staley joins the Chargers after only four years in the league and one season as a coordinator. He coached outside linebackers in Chicago and Denver before overseeing the Rams' No. 1-ranked defense this season under Sean McVay.

"I knew that he could be a D-coordinator," said cornerback Chris Harris Jr., who played in Denver until joining the Chargers this season. "I knew that he should be a D-coordinator. But just to see how fast he's skyrocketed, I mean, that's pretty amazing."

Harris spent nine years with the Broncos, including 2019 when Staley was on Denver's staff. He praised Staley's football knowledge, willingness to listen to players and ability to build relationships. He predicted that teammates will love their new coach and called the situation "a great fit."

"I'm so happy, so excited for him," Harris said. "He's a guy who's very smart, knows the game of football. He took it to another level this year with the Rams. I'm excited to see what he can do with us."

Harris said he and Staley already have spoken, their discussion even going into detail about expected defensive scheme changes. With the Rams, Staley ran a 3-4 as opposed to the 4-3 the Chargers have been employing.

This is the first head coaching job at any level for Staley, 38, who spent 11 years as a college assistant before going to work for the Chicago Bears in February 2017. Six weeks earlier, the Chargers had relocated from San Diego.

During his first season as coach of the Rams, McVay was seven years younger than Staley is today. But by that point, McVay had been in the NFL as an assistant for eight years.

The man who gave Staley his first coaching job said he knew "from the word go" that Staley would be a success. But Joe Novak said no one on that 2006 Northern Illinois staff could have envisioned Staley becoming an NFL coach just 15 years later.

Even less likely, Staley's stops en route to the Chargers were rooted in anything but Power Five football conferences. Among other places, he worked at a Division III school in Minnesota and a community college in Kansas.

Staley established himself as a defensive coordinator with one season at James Madison, a Football Championship Subdivision school, and three at John Carroll, another Division III university.

"I knew he could be good," said Novak, who is retired. "I thought he had all the traits you're looking for. But to go from John Carroll to the Chargers in five years is pretty darn hard to do. I don't think you'll find anybody else who did that."

John Carroll is the school where Chargers general manager Tom Telesco played in the 1990s. Telesco and the Chargers selected Staley from a group of candidates with much more NFL experience, mostly as coordinators. The team also interviewed Jason Garrett, who spent 9½ years as Dallas' coach.

In the end, the Chargers opted for the choice they must believe has more of an NFL future than an NFL past.

The move to hire Staley on Sunday night was met with surprise around the league, in part because Buffalo offensive coordinator Brian Daboll was believed to be a favorite for the position, but also given Staley's relative inexperience. He was a candidate for the openings that remain in Philadelphia and Houston but instead landed a job considered to be one of the most attractive of this hiring cycle.

Staley spent his first three seasons in coaching as a graduate assistant working with the Northern Illinois defense. As a player, he was a quarterback, first at Dayton and then at Division II Mercyhurst University in Pennsylvania.

That combination of knowledge on both sides of the ball is expected to be vital for Staley as he moves into the unfamiliar position of overseeing an entire team.

"He's going to be so easy to work with," Novak said. "The players will love him. And he can coach too. That's a nice combination. He knew back at NIU where he was headed. You don't always find that in people that age."

With the Rams, Staley was armed with All-Pros in lineman Aaron Donald and cornerback Jalen Ramsey. His defense finished first in the NFL in points and yards allowed.

Harris explained that the more impressive thing Staley did this season could be seen in the performances of the other Rams, those defenders who emerged unexpectedly.

"They have a lot of talent over there," Harris said. "You know what you're going to get out of Ramsey and Donald. But you have a lot of no-name players, guys that you've never even heard of, who made a lot of plays on that team too."

Staley is scheduled to meet with the media Thursday for the first time since accepting the job. Along with reaching out to his new players, he is assembling his staff, one that could include current offensive coordinator Shane Steichen, though no announcement has been made.

Multiple reports Monday indicated Staley would be hiring Las Vegas' Frank Smith to be his run game coordinator. Smith has been the tight ends coach for the Raiders the last three years.

Novak said Staley's lack of ego will allow him to bring in assistants who can best supplement his skill-set. He said Staley's personality and energy will be infectious and effective.

"You spend a half-hour with him and you'll know what I'm talking about," Novak said. "You just know. With that kid — he's still a kid to me — you just know. He's got all the qualities."

Chargers head coach Brandon Staley is still in his heart a Perry Pirate

By Jeff Shudel
The News-Herald (Willoughby, Ohio)
June 16, 2021

Get out the welcome banners; Brandon Staley is headed home for the first time in two years.

Staley's feet and head are in California as the first-year head coach of the Los Angeles Chargers. His heart is where it has always been — Perry, Ohio.

Staley, a graduate of Perry High School and the University of Dayton, exudes enthusiasm when he is in front of his players and when he is in front of the media, as he was on Zoom June 16 when the Chargers wrapped up their mandatory minicamp.

Most of the questions directed to Staley were from beat writers covering the Chargers, but the 38-year-old former John Carroll defensive coordinator also took time to talk about his roots and the influence the late Bob Ritley had on him as the Perry head coach. Staley played quarterback for the Pirates.

"Coach Ritley was a special, special man," Staley said. "I don't think I ever met a player, a teacher, a coach or someone that had contact with him that didn't revere him."

"When you were in the presence of him you felt different. You felt special. He had that special way about him. He got the essence of football. He got the essence of teaching. I think that's why we all loved playing for him so much. He had the same staff for over 20 years."

The more Staley talked about the Perry days, the more excited he became.

"All of us that were fortunate enough to go to school there, we all played for the same coaches. We had a lot of stability, a lot of continuity growing up."

"Certainly, I was able to see what a head coach should look like — a leader. A person that not only was a great football coach, but the type of leader and connector within the community. He could have a conversation with anybody and you would feel better about yourself."

"Certainly, I miss him. I've been able to keep in contact with his wife and son Tim, who was a heck of a player growing up. He played at the University of Akron."

"There's nothing like home. That place means a lot to me. I'm actually going back there for the first time in two years in a couple days. Coach Ritley meant an awful lot to me."

Staley has not stayed in one place long since his coaching career began in 2006 as a graduate assistant at Northern Illinois. He made stops at St. Thomas in 2009 (defensive line coach/special teams coach), Hutchinson in 2010-11 (associate head coach/defensive coordinator), Tennessee in 2012 (graduate assistant) John Carroll in 2013 (defensive coordinator/secondary coach), James Madison in 2014 (defensive coordinator/linebackers coach) and then back to John Carroll in 2015-16 as defensive coordinator/secondary coach to end his college coaching gigs.

Staley coached the Bears outside linebackers in 2017-18 and the Broncos outside linebackers in 2019.

It was impossible for Chargers general manager Tom Telesco (a John Carroll graduate) to not take notice, considering in 2020 Staley was defensive coordinator of the Los Angeles Rams, who finished with the top-rated defense last season.

“He’s a genius,” Rams cornerback Jaleel Ramsey told Sports Illustrated when the Chargers hired Staley. “He’s smart. He knows how to use his players, and works well to put his players in position to make plays or have impact on the game.”

“He knows how to get the best out of people. He knows how to calm people down and keep us going throughout the games. I just think he’s great. There’s literally nothing negative I can say about him. I think he would be an amazing head coach.”

The second stint with John Carroll was the launching point for the success that followed, Staley said on the Zoom call. The 2016 team beat Baldwin-Wallace, 17-10, in a defensive struggle in the second game of the season. The Blue Streaks went on to beat powerhouse Mount Union and then won three games in the Division III playoffs before bowing out in a national semifinal at Wisconsin-Oshkosh, 10-3.

“Anybody that knows me knows John Carroll is the place that really shaped me,” Staley said. “I think that’s where I discovered myself as a leader and a coach. I kind of hit a sweet spot there.”

“The people at John Carroll — that place — the players, the coaches, the administration, the professors — that campus community meant a lot to my wife and me. Those players are a big reason why I’m here today. There are too many to name, but that experience with (then John Carroll head coach) Tom Arth was one of those really impactful experiences for me. That’s where I really found my rhythm as a coach.”

“That team we had in 2016 was the best team in school history. It’s one of the best defenses I’ve ever been a part of. That whole process started in 2013. The 2016 team was the end of the run we had. It’s such an example of what you can do when you have special people in place.”

If all goes well with the Chargers, Staley’s nomadic life as a football coach is at an end.

JOE LOMBARDI

Chargers offensive coordinator Joe Lombardi believes the wait was worth it

COSTA MESA — Chargers offensive coordinator Joe Lombardi has noticed the close friendship between quarterbacks Justin Herbert and Chase Daniel and compared them to the 1988 comedy film “Twins.”

Herbert and Daniel are an odd pairing visually because Herbert is six inches taller, but they complement each other as quarterbacks, according to Lombardi.

It’s a perfect pairing between an emerging starting quarterback and a vastly experienced backup.

“You know, it’s really like having another coach in the room,” Lombardi said about Daniel, a 13-year veteran. “It kind of looks like Arnold Schwarzenegger and Danny DeVito in ‘Twins’ when they’re standing next to each other, but it’s great having them.”

The quarterbacks are one of many reasons why Lombardi decided to join the Chargers this year as the offensive coordinator.

Lombardi waited five years before returning as a play caller because he wanted the perfect situation to redeem himself after a short stint as the Detroit Lions’ offensive coordinator in 2014 and 2015.

With a star quarterback in Herbert, a revamped offensive line with an All-Pro center in Corey Linsley and an abundance of playmakers with wide receiver Keenan Allen and running back Austin Ekeler, the Chargers qualified as a perfect situation for Lombardi from a personnel standpoint, but it was his close relationship with Chargers coach Brandon Staley that got him to leave New Orleans after five years as their quarterbacks coach.

Lombardi coached Staley in college when Staley was the quarterback for Mercyhurst University in 2005.

“I really enjoyed my time in New Orleans and was happy there, but you know, my history with Brandon and this organization, I was real excited for the opportunity,” Lombardi said. “I’ve got a lot of experience with (Chargers offensive line coach) Frank Smith from our time in New Orleans. So it’s been very seamless, and it’s a good group.”

Lombardi was familiar with the Chargers’ roster after the Saints’ scrimmages against the Chargers in Costa Mesa between 2017 to 2019. He got a close look at Allen, who’s regarded as one of the best route runners in the NFL.

“As advertised,” Lombardi said about working with Allen. “There’s not better. He’s just always open, just one of those guys. Even when you look at the script and you look at the defense versus the route, and you think, ‘Oh, they’ll probably have him covered,’ but they don’t necessarily. He’s just a fun guy to be around. He’s always positive and has good energy. It’s been great.”

Allen compared Lombardi’s offense to what former Chargers offensive coordinator Ken Whisenhunt ran with quarterback Philip Rivers. He said it’s an elevated version of the West Coast offense, one that will allow him to play more freely.

“Just a step up where I’m allowed to play free and play my game,” Allen said. “The fact that I was in that offense and with Phil for so long, I’m able to translate it into this offense.”

Lombardi said his new offensive system will be a blend from what he ran with the Saints for many years, but with heavy input from Staley, Smith and quarterbacks coach Shane Day.

Lombardi said it didn’t work in Detroit with quarterback Matthew Stafford and wide receiver Calvin Johnson because he was focused on replicating Sean Payton’s system with the Saints.

With another opportunity to call plays, Lombardi is allowing his perfect situation to have plenty of say in building the Chargers’ offense.

New Chargers coordinator Joe Lombardi looks to build offense around Justin Herbert

*By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
January 26, 2021*

His first shot as an NFL offensive coordinator lasted 23 games.

Joe Lombardi now has a second chance and plans to apply a lesson learned in 2014-15.

"Just having the flexibility to adjust a little bit better maybe than we did back then," he said Tuesday in a videoconference. "That's the biggest thing, just the flexibility to adjust as things aren't like you're used to them being."

Lombardi, 49, was hired this week by new coach Brandon Staley to oversee a Chargers offense that features one of the NFL's bright young quarterbacks in Justin Herbert.

Seven years ago, he joined Jim Caldwell's staff in Detroit for a tenure that turned out to be rocky and failed to meet expectations. Lombardi was fired seven games into the 2015 season.

He had spent the previous seven years with New Orleans, first as an offensive assistant and then as quarterbacks coach. Lombardi suggested Tuesday that he had become too rutted in the Saints' way of operating.

His two Lions teams had a difficult time running the ball and in pass protection, which led to Matthew Stafford struggling despite the presence of receivers Calvin Johnson and Golden Tate.

After being dismissed by Caldwell, Lombardi returned to New Orleans, where he spent five more seasons as quarterbacks coach before the Chargers called.

Now, he's in a position where, like Staley last week, he's touting the idea of building a scheme around Herbert rather than forcing the quarterback into a predetermined system.

"I'm comfortable with whatever our guys are good at," Lombardi said. "Man, if it's something the quarterback thrives in, then that's what we're going to want to do."

For Herbert, Lombardi explained that could mean more up-tempo and no-huddle next season. The Chargers tried both this season but with no sustained commitment.

In college, Herbert flourished in an offense that never huddled and operated almost exclusively from the shotgun. Lombardi said he will go back to Herbert's days at Oregon to tap into what the 22-year-old does best.

"He's got a skill set that is elite," Lombardi said. "It appears there's nothing he can't do. He's got an incredibly strong arm, good accuracy. He's very athletic. Sounds like he's a real smart guy that's a good leader."

Along with directing the Chargers' offense, Lombardi is expected to continue developing Herbert after a season that made him the favorite for the NFL's offensive rookie of the year award.

Having spent 12 of the previous 14 years working with Drew Brees, Lombardi said the future Hall of Famer's commitment to detail and exhaustive preparation are two qualities he can pass along to Herbert.

He said that in New Orleans, Brees' influence could be seen in the Saints' other quarterbacks, specifically how they followed his example. He called Brees' traits "coachable."

Lombardi's familiarity with Herbert dates to preparation for last year's draft. He said he began paying closer attention during the season as Herbert gained league-wide exposure by the week.

The Chargers lost to Saints in mid-October, 30-27, in overtime. Herbert finished 20 for 34 for 264 yards and four touchdowns, an effort Lombardi noticed even as he was more focused on Brees.

"I've seen enough to know I've got no questions about his abilities," Lombardi said. "If you lined up all the quarterback skill sets in the NFL, he'd be at the very top with a couple guys."

After a season in which the Chargers offense on occasion lacked aggressiveness, Lombardi said that although game situations sometimes dictate otherwise, he leans toward leaving the offense on the field if there's an opportunity.

"I always say, 'What would I want if I'm on the other sidelines?' " Lombardi said. "I always feel like when a team's going for it on fourth down [it's] like, 'I wish they were just punting it.' So, yeah, I'm a big fan of going for it on fourth down."

Lombardi said he was drawn to the Chargers' job mostly because of his relationship with Staley. In 2005, both were at Mercyhurst University, Lombardi as offensive coordinator and Staley as quarterback.

He also said he is not surprised Staley received a head coaching job after only four seasons in the NFL. Lombardi recalled a conversation the two had a few years ago about Staley making it to the league as a coach.

"I said, 'Look, you'll get your chance, and I bet you you'll be a head coach in five years,' " Lombardi said, smiling. "Pretty sure I called that one a long time ago."

Chargers' Joe Lombardi eager to build an offense around Justin Herbert

Brandon Staley observed from the back of the room while Joe Lombardi instructed the New Orleans Saints' quarterbacks, including Drew Brees.

Nearly 12 years before Staley asked Lombardi to be his offensive coordinator with the Chargers, Lombardi invited his former quarterback turned coach to a training camp visit as the Saints embarked on their Super Bowl season of 2009.

"I'd bet you that he's watched every single game we've played on offense here in New Orleans since then," Lombardi said Tuesday about Staley, who at the time coached defensive linemen and special teams at St. Thomas, a Division III program in Minnesota. "Just (Staley's) familiarity with me and what we've done here (in New Orleans), it makes it such an easier transition."

If Lombardi's guess about the recently-hired Chargers head coach is true, then Staley has watched more than 160 Saints games from the past decade.

On Monday, Staley hired Lombardi as the Chargers' new offensive coordinator. Lombardi spent 12 seasons on Sean Payton's coaching staff during two stints in New Orleans — 10 overall as the quarterbacks coach, including the past five seasons.

Lombardi, 49, said he had interest in other coaching jobs since the Detroit Lions fired him as the offensive coordinator in 2015, but he wasn't going to jump at any opportunity. It needed to make sense and familiarity was important to him.

Staley, 38, was Lombardi's quarterback for one season at Mercyhurst University in 2005, when Lombardi was the offensive coordinator.

"Brandon, No. 1," Lombardi said when asked why the Chargers' opening was the right fit. "How well I know him and I think how well he knows me. ... Not to mean that we're going to copy (the Saints' offense), but just coming from a common background of football, to be able to get things started. As he is in the beginning of putting a staff together, what he is looking for, it all lines up with the way that I think.

"Sean Payton often says that he is more interested in compatibility first before he thinks about capability. I just think that the compatibility of what Brandon is building here is going to be second-to-none."

Lombardi will likely incorporate some parts of the Saints' offense to form the right scheme for quarterback Justin Herbert and the rest of the Chargers' offense, but he knows the importance of flexibility.

Lombardi said a reason why his stint with the Lions didn't work out was because he forced the Saints' offensive system instead of using it as a starting point to build off players' strengths. The Lions finished 11-5 during Lombardi's first season in 2014, but the offense based on short passes, timing and precision produced mixed results for quarterback Matthew Stafford and a Lions team that ranked 19th in total offense. It got worse the following season and the Lions fired Lombardi after a 1-6 start.

"The biggest thing is just being able to be more flexible," Lombardi said about what he learned the most as a first-time play caller in Detroit. "Spending so much time in New Orleans and doing things one way, you kind of get used to that. When you're put into a new situation where the schedule is different, and maybe you're around coaches that weren't used to doing things the way that you were used to, just having flexibility to adjust a little bit better maybe than we did back then.

"That's the biggest thing, just the flexibility to adjust when things aren't the way that you're used to them being."

Staley has only coached in the NFL for four seasons, but he's had plenty of success by prioritizing players' strengths over schemes. Lombardi said he is eager to form an offensive coaching staff with Staley.

Lombardi wants coaches from other offensive schemes to provide different perspectives, which will be vital for Herbert's development after a dynamic rookie season.

"He's got a skill set that's elite," Lombardi said about Herbert. "It appears there's nothing that he can't do. He's got an incredibly strong arm, good accuracy and he's very athletic. Sounds like he's a real smart guy that's a good leader. He just checks all the boxes."

Lombardi said it's too soon to reveal what the Chargers' offense will look like in 2021, but he said Staley wants tempo.

With Herbert's downfield accuracy, and Staley looking to play off his quarterbacks' strengths, Lombardi will likely call many deep shots, but he understands what type of weapons Herbert has.

Wide receiver Keenan Allen, running back Austin Ekeler and tight end Hunter Henry thrive with up-tempo passes, a staple of the Saints' offense since Payton took over in 2006. The Chargers' trio had a similar style with quarterback Philip Rivers before Herbert took over in 2020.

Allen had an instant connection with Herbert, but Henry and Ekeler, one of the best pass-catching running backs in the NFL, often got lost when the rookie quarterback was looking upfield for wide receivers Mike Williams, Jalen Guyton and Tyron Johnson.

It will be up to Lombardi and Staley to find the right balance to utilize all of the Chargers' skill players.

Lombardi has shown he's able to evolve around his Saints quarterbacks in recent years. He's worked with quick passers Brees and Teddy Bridgewater, aggressive quarterback Jameis Winston and athletic quarterback Taysom Hill. Watching how Payton changed the Saints' offense from Brees as the focal point to wide receiver Michael Thomas and running back Alvin Kamara as the centerpieces, will likely help Lombardi in his second opportunity as an offensive coordinator.

Lombardi said it's important to have a balanced offense, which scared some Chargers fans on social media, but he reiterated the importance of using Herbert's strengths as a passer.

"I think it's important to have some balance," Lombardi said. "But when you have a quarterback as talented as Justin, you want to let him throw the ball when it's appropriate. That's for sure."

Herbert had a historic rookie season under prior head coach Anthony Lynn, but the coaching staff was often criticized for conservative play calling and not taking enough chances on fourth down. Lombardi wasn't as cautious in his response when asked about possibly going for it more on fourth downs.

"I'm a big fan of going for it on fourth down," Lombardi said. "I know all the data analysis says that we are probably not aggressive enough as NFL coaches. I'm in favor of moving in that direction."

Chargers' Lombardi hoping to make most of second chance

*By Joe Reedy

COSTA MESA, Calif. (AP) — Joe Lombardi is hoping that his second stint as an offensive coordinator goes better than the first.

Lombardi, who accepted the Los Angeles Chargers coordinator opening over the weekend, said on Tuesday the biggest thing he learned from his first opportunity in Detroit was that he needs to be more flexible when assessing his personnel and their abilities. Lombardi went to the Lions in 2015, but was fired seven games into the following season.

"Spending so much time in New Orleans and doing things one way, you kind of get used to that," he said. "When you're put into a new situation where the schedule is different, and maybe you're around coaches that weren't used to doing things the way that you were used to, just having to flexibility to adjust a little bit better, maybe, than we did back then."

Lombardi comes to Los Angeles after a second stint in New Orleans, where he was the quarterbacks coach for five seasons. Twelve of his 14 seasons as an NFL assistant have been with the Saints.

Chargers head coach Brandon Staley and Lombardi have worked together before, but in a player-coach capacity. Lombardi was the offensive coordinator and quarterbacks coach at Mercyhurst College in 2005, when Staley transferred from Dayton to play with his twin brother, Jason.

Staley, who was hired as coach on Jan. 17, said Lombardi's experience with the Saints should prove invaluable.

"You think about the relationship he has with Drew Brees and having a front-row seat to that relationship. It's huge," Staley said. "And then obviously partnering up with Sean Payton — one of the best offensive coaches in the NFL, really one of the best coaches period — that experience is invaluable."

Lombardi said the biggest thing he gained from Brees is being exact on details and that other things, such as how to communicate with the receivers, is coachable.

The first task for Lombardi will be trying to create a system that further showcases quarterback Justin Herbert, who passed for 4,336 yards and a rookie-record 31 touchdowns this past season.

Lombardi said he hasn't spoken to Herbert yet, but that he has reached out to him after finally getting his number. Lombardi scouted Herbert leading up to last year's draft and had a chance to see him in person when the Chargers faced the Saints.

"I've seen enough to know that I have no questions about his abilities," said Lombardi about Herbert. "I mean, if you lined up all the quarterback skillsets in the NFL, he'd be at the very top, with couple of guys. Like I said, the sky's the limit with what he's able to do."

In discussions with Staley, Lombardi said they are looking to have an up-tempo offense. The Chargers were ranked ninth in the league in total offense, including sixth in passing. While they have a solid array of skill position players — including running back Austin Ekeler along with wide receivers Keenan Allen and Mike Williams — the Chargers have struggled to build an offensive line and have lacked depth because of key injuries.

"Look, I'm comfortable with whatever our guys are good at. If it's something that the quarterback thrives in, that's what we're going to want to do," Lombardi said.

RENALDO HILL

Chargers' new defense leader Renaldo Hill is well- coordinated with Brandon Staley

They spent the 2019 season together in Denver, as in really together.

Renaldo Hill explained that his office was next to Brandon Staley's, and the two frequently swapped ideas.

"I think we probably spent more time in the other person's office just talking and game-planning than our own," Hill said Wednesday. "It was important to us."

They now are teaming up again, Staley as the Chargers' new head coach and Hill as his defensive coordinator.

Barely a year ago, they were position coaches for the Broncos. Staley worked with the outside linebackers and Hill the defensive backs. Neither has been in the NFL long, Staley only four seasons and Hill three.

But in 2021, they will combine efforts to oversee a defense led by Joey Bosa up front and Derwin James everywhere else.

Staley, who was hired away from the Rams after one year as their defensive coordinator, will call defensive plays during games while Hill manages the operation.

"We'll collaborate," Hill said. "[Staley has] always been open to listening and receiving. I'm looking forward to the opportunity. But, in the meantime, I definitely will lean on Staley and be able to sit back and learn."

The setup is similar to what they experienced in Denver, where head coach Vic Fangio has called the defense the last two years with Ed Donatell serving as coordinator.

The Chargers will be switching to a hybrid 3-4 scheme that is expected to present various fronts, often employs more defensive backs and emphasizes versatility.

"We want to uniquely shape it around our guys," Staley explained last week. "I think that's probably the hallmark of the way we play, that agility that we have to feature our premium players."

Under former coordinator Gus Bradley, the Chargers blitzed as little as any team. Though they are expected to bring extra pressure more in 2021, the Chargers don't figure to be blitz heavy.

Staley and the Rams ranked 19th in blitz percentage this season. Using a similar 3-4 system under Fangio, Denver finished in the bottom half of the NFL in blitzing in 2019-20.

Hill, 42, was drafted in the seventh round by Arizona in 2001 and had a decade-long career. His playing days ended when the Broncos cut him in late July 2011. During that summer, he met Chris Harris, an undrafted rookie cornerback the Broncos had signed out of Kansas. Harris was with Denver for nine years and now is entering his second season with the Chargers.

"I heard about some of the noise, that this young guy was flashing, making plays all over the field," Hill recalled, smiling. "And, you know, 10 years down the road he's still doing the same thing."

Hill's coaching tenure began in 2012 as a graduate assistant at Wyoming. Two years later, he was out of coaching and spent time visiting various college programs. He said he went to his alma mater, Michigan State, as well as Alabama, Utah and North Dakota State.

"I just wanted to continue to build while I was out of the game," Hill said. "I was always trying to find out how I could advance and move forward."

He got a job coaching defensive backs at the University of Pittsburgh in 2015 and spent three years there before reaching the NFL as an assistant with Miami. Hill was with the Broncos the last two seasons.

Now, he's a coordinator entering just his fourth year in the league and with a team that is transitioning to a new staff but has enough promise to be considered beyond rebuilding.

"It may have been a fast move up, but I felt like I was preparing myself," Hill said. "You have to say there was some luck there. But I'm thankful for every opportunity I've been in."

Though the Chargers have announced nothing officially, Hill indicated that Giff Smith, who has coached the team's defensive line the last five years, will remain on staff.

He also said Derrick Ansley and Tom Donatell will be joining the Chargers. Ansley had been the defensive coordinator at the University of Tennessee and Donatell, an ex-UCLA assistant, a quality control coach for Seattle.

The Chargers also have hired defensive line coach Jay Rodgers and Joe Barry, who is expected to be the defensive run game coordinator.

New Chargers DC Renaldo Hill excited to reunite with Brandon Staley

By Gilbert Manzano

Brandon Staley and Renaldo Hill spent countless hours in each other's offices as defensive coaches on the Denver Broncos' staff to not only prepare for their 2019 opponents but for future offensive schemes they might face.

Planning ahead is why Staley, the recently hired Chargers head coach, decided to hire Hill as his defensive coordinator.

"Let's figure out some puzzles," Hill recalled Wednesday about his game-planning hours with Staley. "Let's find the new things that people are doing and let's attack them ... We're always looking for the next thing. How can we improve our defense?"

The two became close during their lone season together in Denver, with Staley as the outside linebackers coach and Hill as the defensive backs coach.

Hill remained in the same role with the Broncos this past season and Staley went on to be the Rams' defensive coordinator.

Now they'll reunite to use their past notes and brainstorm for the Chargers.

Staley will call the plays for the defense, but Hill said the new job intrigued him because he knows Staley will allow his heavy input on game days.

"I'm going to lean on (Staley) earlier in this process," said Hill, a first-time defensive coordinator.

"But I know he's always open to listen to ideas. And he has his own ideas, I have mine. But as a defensive staff, we'll definitely collaborate on all those and come up with the best for the guys, but he's always been open to listening and receiving. A lot of times you may be in rooms and it might not be received as well."

Hill, 42, played 10 NFL seasons as safety for the Arizona Cardinals, then-Oakland Raiders, Miami Dolphins and Broncos. He coached for college programs Wyoming and Pittsburgh before landing his first NFL coaching job with the Dolphins in 2018 as an assistant defensive backs coach.

Hill said Tampa Bay Buccaneers defensive coordinator Todd Bowles inspired him to become a coach when Bowles coached him with the Dolphins in 2008.

"The way his brain operated, that's something that I think we have a shared common," Hill said about Bowles.

"Always thinking from a different lens. He always talked to me about, 'You know this game. There will be a lot of people with a lot of experience.' It's good to pick up that experience from him and understand that they have something to offer, but don't sell yourself short on the things you know about this game as well."

Staley also noticed that potential in Hill, and referred to him as a "young superstar," according to Hill during the recruiting pitch.

Hill said this opportunity will help him learn how to coach defensive linemen and linebackers while still sharing his extensive knowledge to the Chargers' defensive backs.

Eventually, Hill wants to use this experience for bigger coaching roles and he believes Staley will allow him to grow as a coach with the Chargers.

“That’s one of the first things that Staley mentioned is about putting guys in better positions in order to move up and advance,” said Hill, a Black coach, when discussing the NFL’s lack of diversity among coaches. “It just wasn’t lip service.”

“(Staley is) always talking with his staff about putting guys in position to move up, and I know that’s something, once I step in that building, that’d be the game plan for not only myself but the rest of the staff.”

Hill didn’t get into specifics about how the Chargers will look defensively in 2021, but he stressed the importance of bringing pressure and disguising coverages, possibly from a Cover-2 scheme with two safeties downfield.

The Chargers rarely blitzed in the past four seasons with Gus Bradley as defensive coordinator. Bradley often utilized a four-man rush and used Cover-3 with a single-high safety.

“You have to bring those simulated pressures,” Hill said. “You have to bring those five-man pressures as well as six. Obviously, you want to be able to mix those things in, but you also want to see how your personnel fits to all those things.”

“But I think it’s important to understand the personnel and how we want to operate, but I believe you have to bring pressure in this league. I believe you have to change it up and give these quarterbacks multiple looks. You also have to know who you’re going against, because of the quarterbacks we have in our conference, they invite pressure.”

Hill was likely referring to Chiefs quarterback Patrick Mahomes.

He’s looking forward to game planning against him twice a year, along with the many other talented quarterbacks in the NFL.

Chargers’ Hill eager for first shot as defensive coordinator

COSTA MESA, Calif. (AP) — Renaldo Hill is getting his first opportunity to be a defensive coordinator, although he won’t be thrown into the deep end of the pool just yet.

Los Angeles Chargers coach Brandon Staley will call the plays during games, allowing Hill to be able to progress at his own pace. It is a hierarchy Hill is used to. During his two seasons coaching defensive backs with the Denver Broncos, coach Vic Fangio called the plays while coordinator Ed Donatell handled things during the week.

“I definitely will lean on Staley, and be able to sit back and learn. It still gives you that that growth opportunity,” Hill said Wednesday. “I can move around and assert myself into the front seven, but also still have a footprint on the back end.”

The 42-year-old Hill has eight years of coaching experience after a 10-year playing career with the Cardinals, Raiders, Dolphins and Broncos.

He joined the Dolphins staff as assistant defensive backs coach in 2018 after five years at Wyoming and Pittsburgh, before being hired by the Broncos.

Hill and Staley worked together in Denver in 2019, when Staley was coaching outside linebackers.

“We’ll definitely collaborate on those and come up with what’s best for the guys, but he’s always been open to listening and receiving ideas,” Hill said. “Staley emphasizes all the time it is a collaboration of voices in the room, and everybody having their opinion in what this defense will look like. When you can listen to those other ideas, it makes everybody feel a part of what we’re doing, we’re having success.”

Hill inherits a unit that has defensive end Joey Bosa and safety Derwin James as its cornerstones, but plenty of questions. Bosa missed four games last season due to concussions and James has played in only five games the past two seasons due to foot and knee injuries.

After four years of running a 4-3 scheme under Gus Bradley, the Chargers will go back to a 3-4 defense. Los Angeles was ranked 10th in total defense this past season, but had six games in which it squandered double-digit leads. The Chargers were also 25th in sacks and tied for 22nd in takeaways.

Hill said he is looking for the defense to have a more consistent pass rush and to better pressure the quarterback. The Chargers were last in blitzing, averaging 6.1 per game while the league average is 11.7.

Hill also revealed that defensive line coach Giff Smith is being retained, while Derrick Ansley, Joe Barry and Tom Donatell are joining the staff.

DERIUS SWINTON II

Chargers are hoping Derius Swinton II can fix disastrous special teams

*By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
January 28, 2021*

A lot of things didn’t go well for the Chargers in 2020.

Except on special teams, where pretty much nothing went well.

By every measure available, the Chargers this season got kicked in the kicking game.

“I’m not here because I’m some guru,” Derius Swinton II said Thursday. “I’m here because of the relationships I’ve had with the players and the performances they put on the field.”

Improved special teams performances in 2021 certainly would be welcomed by the Chargers and new head coach Brandon Staley, who hired Swinton to coordinate his team’s third phase.

The Chargers missed too many kicks, had too many punts blocked and too frequently failed to set up the offense or defense on changes of possession.

The production was so poor that veteran coach George Stewart was removed as coordinator in late November. When that change didn’t help, former head coach Anthony Lynn took over special teams to finish the season.

After Lynn was fired on Jan. 4, general manager Tom Telesco praised Stewart’s efforts and admitted the kicking game failures were because of inadequate roster building.

“I didn’t do a good enough job getting him the players that he needs,” Telesco said. “I need to do a better job stacking that group. And I will. From top to bottom, it just wasn’t nearly good enough.”

Now the Chargers turn to Swinton, 35, who has spent more than a decade in the NFL and was the special teams coordinator for the 2016 San Francisco 49ers. He was an assistant with Arizona this season.

Asked to identify his philosophy in building productive special teams, Swinton referenced the “three f’s of football.”

“It’s not going to be grammatically correct, but it sticks with the players,” he explained. “We’re going to play fast, physical and fundamentally sound. ... My mom’s an English teacher. So, phonetically, that’s correct.”

Michael Badgley is coming off a season in which he missed 12 kicks — nine field goals and three extra points. He was perfect from shorter distances but converted only 10 of 19 field goal tries from 40 yards or more.

Ty Long had three punts blocked and ranked 30th in net average and punts inside the 20-yard line. The Chargers surrendered the most punt return yards in the NFL.

Telesco said the poor kicking game performances contributed to the team's struggles in close outcomes. During a stretch that began in Week 2, the Chargers went 0-7 in one-possession games.

Though they ranked near the middle league-wide in kickoff returns, only four teams were less productive returning punts. They were fourth-worst in average kickoff return yards allowed.

All totaled, it's little wonder that Telesco called improving the special teams "a point of emphasis" for the upcoming offseason.

Another area where Swinton could impact the Chargers in 2021 is game management, an expectation Staley referred to in a statement released by the team Monday to announce coordinator changes.

Game management was another struggle for Lynn and his staff as the Chargers finished 7-9. There were issues with strategic decisions and communication in vital moments.

With the Cardinals this season, Swinton said he was part of a three-man team that assisted head coach Kliff Kingsbury in such matters.

While Kingsbury was busy calling offensive plays, for example, Swinton said he and two fellow staffers would plot what to do next based on game circumstances.

"I think it was that flow of communication, situationally, that led us to be one of the better teams, if you look at two-minute, four-minute and end-of-game [situations]," Swinton said. "It's just communication."

While watching the NFL's conference championship games Sunday, Swinton said he and Staley were texting back and forth about what they would do at certain crucial points.

He said Staley finally just called him so the two could talk in more depth.

"We're football nuts, I guess you could say," Swinton said. "I think the more the entire staff, coordinators, work together with the head coach, and we start seeing the game the same way, it's just going to work together. ... I always said that you try to see the landmines before they blow up, you know what I mean?"

Derius Swinton wants Chargers' special teams to sizzle

*By Gilbert Manzano
Orange County Register
January 28, 2021*

Derius Swinton binged every snap of the Chargers' special teams in 2020 before interviewing for the team's coordinator position.

Swinton saw all the glaring mistakes that occurred for arguably the worst unit in the NFL, but that didn't make him wonder how general manager Tom Telesco would address the unit in the draft and free agency.

Swinton noticed the players the Chargers had in their "cabinet" and didn't hesitate when coach Brandon Staley offered him the job of special teams coordinator. With 10 years of special teams coaching experience for six NFL teams, Swinton had no issue with making it work with what he has. Swinton was an assistant special teams coach for the Arizona Cardinals last year.

"When building special teams, and when building a team, I think it's like making a meal," Swinton told reporters Thursday in his introductory news conference. "I don't worry about what groceries I have. I just take the groceries that I have in my cabinet and I make the meal. I don't care if I have fresh fruit, or if the fruit's a day old or a week old. As long as it's not spoiled, we can make a meal."

Swinton, a former 49ers special teams coordinator in 2016, will likely receive better ingredients for fixing the Chargers' special teams in 2021. Telesco took blame for not providing the previous coaching regime the proper special teams players and referred to the unit as a priority he plans on upgrading this offseason.

But Swinton, 35, will still have the tough task of quickly fixing special teams with many new faces and limited practice time, especially if the NFL decides to cancel the offseason program for a second consecutive year because of the coronavirus pandemic.

"Would you love to have guys that are (like Patriots' special teamer) Matthew Slater, that are 12-year Pro Bowl guys, all over the place?" Swinton asked. "Yeah, but that's not the realistic view of the NFL. Your roster is going to fluctuate here and there. As a coach, you just have to give them tools to be successful. I think that's what I'm in charge to do, with whoever is on the roster."

"We have to find what they do best and put them into those situations to be successful. Age and those things, they'll vary. Selfishly, yeah, I wish I had 10 Pro Bowlers – everybody wants that, right? But, realistically, you take your groceries, whatever you're given, and you make the best meal that you can make every single week."

The Chargers overlooked special teams last season and filled the unit with inexperienced players, which led to disastrous results in most areas. The Chargers had a league-high three punts blocked, and ranked 28th with an average of 5.6 yards for punt returns.

Kicker Michael Badgley missed nine field goals, including the potential game winner versus the New Orleans Saints last season. Punter Ty Long placed only 12 punts inside the 20-yard line, which ranked 30th at the position.

The poor execution on special teams was noticeable in games versus the Miami Dolphins, when the Chargers fell behind 14-0 because of the unit's mistakes, and during the 45-0 loss to the New England Patriots, when they allowed touchdowns on a punt return and a blocked field goal.

One reason why Swinton wasn't concerned with how the front office would address special teams was because of his close relationship with Staley. The two have similar philosophies for special teams, and that stems from their one year together as assistant coaches on the Chicago Bears' staff in 2017.

Swinton said Staley attended all of his special teams meetings in Chicago. Swinton was the Bears' assistant special teams coach and Staley coaches the outside linebackers.

"When a position coach takes the time out to sit in your meeting, as a special teams coach, it shows that it means something not only to him, but to the rest of the team, to the head coach," Swinton said about Staley. "That's where that relationship started. That's where I think it'll keep growing."

Swinton got into coaching after playing college football for Hampton University. His first NFL coaching job came in 2009 with the then-St. Louis Rams as a special teams quality control coach. Swinton learned from one of the best special teams coaches in Jeff Rodgers, the assistant head coach and special teams coordinator for the Cardinals. Swinton worked with Rodgers with the Denver Broncos, Bears and Cardinals.

"Working with him and learning from him, and growing from co-worker to brother, just helped my career and my life in so many ways," Swinton said. "I'm always indebted to him, and he knows that."

If Swinton is able to fix the Chargers' sluggish special teams, he too will likely earn a reputation for being one of the best coaches in that area.

Fixing broken special teams top priority for new Los Angeles Chargers coaching staff

*By Shelley Smith
ESPN.com
January 29, 2021*

COSTA MESA, Calif. -- When we last checked in with the Los Angeles Chargers' special teams unit, there was a lot wrong. There were either a) too many players on the field, or not enough b) punts being blocked or fumbled c) wrong plays being called or d) coaches being changed and changed again.

Basically, anything that could go wrong did go wrong, as the Chargers were at the bottom of ESPN's FPI special teams rankings for most of the season and finished tied with the Minnesota Vikings for last in the league.

Former coach Anthony Lynn -- who took over special teams for Keith Burns (who had previously taken over for George Stewart) after a disastrous 45-0, Week 13 loss to the New England Patriots in which the Chargers gave up a punt-return and a blocked field goal touchdown -- was fired at the end of the season. The Spanos family hired former Los Angeles Rams defensive coordinator Brandon Staley, who brought in Derius Swinton as special teams coordinator to clean up the mess.

Staley has previous ties to Swinton, as both were on the Chicago Bears' coaching staff in 2017. Swinton has coached special teams for eight NFL franchises over 13 years, most recently as the Arizona Cardinals' assistant special teams coach last season.

Swinton he says he has already watched every single Chargers special teams play from this past season. And he's confident he can fix what went wrong, from on-field confusion to working with inexperienced players.

"It's a process," Swinton said Thursday. "It's first, where are we at when we do well with these guys and from there we're just going to educate them.

"I don't believe in looking backwards. You just go through a process every day, and then talk. You evaluate first, then you get with each other and they come in and you implement your system around them. The cupboard is not empty here."

Indeed. If anything the problem was miscommunication -- for example, when the field-goal unit and offense were on the field at the same time as time ran out in the first half in Week 14 against the Atlanta Falcons, costing the Chargers a chip-shot field-goal attempt.

"I can't speak for what they were doing," Swinton said. "You have relative practice, your catalog of situations. And you start talking the same language. The culture from every single person from the head coach to the kicker, maybe even the trainer. They've seen it so much they start picking up on it and then you build the community so that when you get to game day, everybody starts to see it."

Blocking and coverage breakdowns were the norm for the Chargers' special teams this past season, leading to multiple blocked punts against them. Wilfredo Lee/AP Swinton said in Arizona that the entire team would meet and go over situations that could arise. Staley is expected to sit in on special teams meetings, showing how important he views that part of the game.

Swinton said that approach is infectious, to the point that nobody wanted to be left out of Cardinals' special teams meetings.

"It was like a party," he said. "It was a mindset. No football game in the history of football has started without a kickoff or a return. It's a big selling point. Patrick Mahomes is not starting the Super Bowl," he explained, highlighting that the game will start with a kickoff.

Swinton says he goes by three (phonetic) Fs -- Fast, Physical, and Fundamentally Sound. He said his unit will go through the same fundamental drills every day.

"It's not grammatically correct, but it stays with the players," he said.

Swinton sees himself more as a caddy than a coach.

"I recommend clubs at time," he said. "But they're the pros."

Swinton also understands attention spans, or lack thereof. He builds five-minute clips of plays, then narrates them and gives them to the players before they are expected to know them. It saves on note taking and allows him to direct players toward watching certain plays in advance. And then the next day, it's a discussion, rather than a lecture.

"They can learn a new Tik-Tok dance in 30 seconds, so you gotta catch them," he said.

And Swinton believes in a three-person, play-evaluator team to take pressure off the head coach, or whomever is calling plays. He and Staley were on the phone texting and talking all through last weekend's championship games. He can't watch a game as a fan.

"It's just not possible when you're a coach," he said.

ODAY ABOUSHI

Chargers continue to bolster offensive line with Oday Aboushi

*By Gilbert Manzano

Matt Feiler, the Chargers' recent free-agent acquisition, wasn't sure which offensive guard spot he'll mandate this upcoming season.

He might have a better idea Saturday morning after the Chargers announced they agreed to terms with offensive guard Oday Aboushi.

Aboushi, a nine-year veteran, agreed to a one-year, $2 million deal, according to NFL Network's Mike Garafolo. Aboushi spent the past two seasons with the Detroit Lions, where he started seven games at right guard last season.

Aboushi, who turns 30 in June, has appeared in 65 career regular-season games, including 42 starts with five NFL teams. He was drafted by the New York Jets in the fifth round of the 2013 draft.

Three of the Chargers' four free-agent acquisitions this week were interior offensive linemen, including All-Pro center Corey Linsley and Feiler. The team also agreed to terms with tight end Jared Cook.

Feiler told reporters Friday that the Chargers didn't specify which guard spot he'll play, but if the team wants consistency for their newcomers, Feiler can patrol the left side because he started 13 games there last year with the Pittsburgh Steelers.

The Chargers will likely have three new interior offensive linemen in 2021, but it's not a guarantee that Aboushi will start next to Feiler and Linsley. But the veteran from the University of Virginia will at least provide depth and versatility with starting experience at both guard spots.

The Chargers might add competition for Aboushi during next month's NFL draft, but they'll likely prioritize offensive tackle with their No. 13 overall pick. They have a vacancy at left tackle after addressing the interior of the offensive line in free agency.

Trai Turner, last year's starting right guard, was released this month to clear cap space.

JOEY BOSA

Joey Bosa enjoying learning and exploring Los Angeles Chargers' new defense

By Shelley Smith
August 5, 2021

COSTA MESA, Calif. -- To see Joey Bosa move -- like, say, between the field and the (healthy) snack cart after practice -- you'd think he was more like a sloth. Slow, deliberate, slower. You'd never guess he was one of the best and fastest edge rushers in the NFL.

But put Bosa on the football field, specifically in this new defense the Los Angeles Chargers are running, and the 6-foot-5, 280-pound Bosa has cat-like reflexes, brutal off the ball and even more brutal when he makes contact, which is often -- even without pads.

That's not to say that Bosa is completely comfortable standing on the edge, rather than down with a hand in the dirt. He does both, depending on whether new coach Brandon Staley has the Chargers in a 3-4 defense or a 4-3. It's all designed to keep the opposing offense guessing and is completely unpredictable, which is how Staley likes it.

And the thought of Bosa being utilized in many different ways is a scary thought to opposing defenses.

"There's a lot going on," Bosa said. "A lot of moving pieces. Usually I'm coming in here and I'm solely focused on how I'm rushing each day, which is another dynamic. I get to judge myself on another level, and it's fun. But yeah, it's going to take some time."

But football smarts are not an issue for Bosa.

"I'm going to make a few mistakes here and there, but by the time camp is over, I'm sure it will be second nature," he said.

On one sequence, Bosa took on rookie offensive tackle Rashawn Slater, who has been praised by just about everyone in camp. Slater was a first-round draft pick for a reason, a player who got the best of defending rookie defensive player of the year Chase Young (then at Ohio State) during his junior year at Northwestern -- setting up a great Week 1 matchup between Slater and Young when the Chargers head to Washington.

But back to Bosa and his gait ... the quick, game-time one. He faced Slater, who slowed him initially and held up until the whistle blew to end the rep. But if the whistle had blown just a little bit later, who knows if the rook would have held up.

"I turn into a different guy when I get mad," Bosa has said many times.

Bosa isn't the only player who loves the new scheme.

"It's refreshing," said defensive lineman Justin Jones. "It allows a team the inability to adjust to what we're going. It keeps them on their toes, which means offensive linemen are on their toes. They're not going to know who's blitzing -- who's coming and who's not coming.

"It's going to be hard to figure us out (for the opponents). What we're doing, what we're bringing. We're never a standstill defense and that's going to make us really hard to beat."

That suits Bosa just fine, even if it means learning a new scheme and a new stance. But Bosa admits they're not easy to learn, which he's fine with.

"A good defense shouldn't be easy to learn in two days," Bosa said. "So it's a fun challenge. Obviously seeing it live is a lot different than sitting at home reviewing on my book. ... It's not as much the athletic part of it. It's just seeing the field, understanding the formation, seeing shifts. There's a lot of moving pieces. I think it's a dynamic defense."

It's a defense who involves fast and relentless hitting, which is how Bosa has played his entire career. Even last season, when he was battling a bunch of injuries, Bosa still recorded 7.5 sacks and 39 tackles.

"Joey Bosa, he'd be good doing anything," Staley said. "We're trying to get him into a new comfort zone -- there are some things we're asking him to do that he hasn't done before. I think that more than anything, what he does best he'll be able to do at a high level. Some of the other things that are brand new for him will help not only himself but his teammates and we've tried to map that out for him. He's been great."

"You need premium players to play the type of defense we hope to play."

Perhaps the safest way to slow Bosa down is to bring a dog around, which perhaps is why Bosa doesn't have one ("I can barely take care of myself," he has said).

But he loves them. He slowly crawled up on the field to hug the Chargers' rescue mascot "Bolt" saying, "Come play with me," and hugged him tight.

BRYAN BULAGA

A Conversation With: Bryan Bulaga

June 29, 2021

This summer, we thought we'd check in with a few Chargers players before training camp and the 2021 season kick into gear.

Our first conversation features right tackle Bryan Bulaga.

Though 2021 is only Bulaga's second season with the Chargers, the team has added many new faces on the offensive line making him the veteran Bolt in the room.

Here's my conversation with Bulaga on the offseason program, his reunion with Corey Linsley, thoughts on Rashawn Slater, and much more.

Year two with the Chargers, and a real offseason! How's it been going for you?

Bryan Bulaga: It's going really well. I think it's been really positive so far. Coach Staley, I think, is gonna be a phenomenal head coach in this league. I think he's changed the energy and kind of the mindset of the team already in the offseason, which has been good. For me personally, having o-line coach Frank Smith, I think he's a very good football coach as well. He's really fun to be around. He teaches the scheme well, he's able to adapt to systems that guys have been in and what they've done and kind of convert it to the new scheme that we're going to be going with. It's been really good so far.

Frank Smith, in his presser, mentioned four Cs: "clear, consistent, concise communication." How does that philosophy benefit this offensive line?

Bulaga: First things first, with us up front, it's all about communication. I think when you can have good communication in the offensive line room, that's only gonna help the group perform better on Sundays. Obviously, throughout a game week or throughout training camp or what we've been in right now, especially with the new scheme, we're installing things and seeing it for the first time, so being on the field with it for the first time, there's gonna be a lot of questions. There's gonna be things that we don't have the answers to right now because this is new to all the guys, but having a coach who's able to communicate those things and be clear about what we need to do and make sure there's no gray area is great.

One of the new guys on this offensive line is a familiar face for you in Corey Linsley. He said you played a really big part in him coming out here. I joked with him, how good of a salesman are you?!

Bulaga: laughs Corey didn't need me to sell him! To me, he's been one of the best centers in the league for at least the last three or four years. I played with him for quite a long time. When I knew he was probably going to hit the market, I definitely kind of picked his brain a bit. When it's the offseason, we don't talk about football too much but this one we did and I was just trying to see where he was at. Where were places he'd be interested in? Turns out the Chargers were looking for a center! I was able to kind of communicate with him, especially with new coaches, who I wasn't overly familiar with, but when Brandon (Staley) was hired, I had spoken to Brandon and then spoken to Frank, so I was able to give Corey some insight as to what to expect and what kind of the overall feel and vibe was for the new coaches. Obviously at the end of the day, he makes his own decision and what's best for him and his family, but I just kind of did my best to communicate with him kind of what the deal was out here and the outlook of the team and what to expect. Fortunate for us, he chose to come here.

What does his presence mean on this offensive line?

Bulaga: I think when you have a guy that is as intelligent as he is, that eases a lot of minds, not only from a coach's standpoint, but he's going to be extremely beneficial for Justin (Herbert.) He is one of the smartest guys I know, not only on the football field but also off it. To have a guy snapping the ball to you that has seen everything; scheme-wise there's stuff that he's used to with this new offense. To have a guy that can take control at the line of scrimmage making calls, making IDs, and helping Justin identify things, and taking that off of his plate is big time. Obviously for us up front, there's no secrets about it, the center gets us all on the same page. He's the guy making the calls, he's doing all those things. He gets everyone the right messaging up and down the line. To have a guy who can do that and perform at a very high level, it's huge.

And speaking to him off the field, he's the guy Aaron Rodgers wants to challenge in "Jeopardy!" So, he's got that intelligence!

Bulaga: He does! I think Corey would give him a pretty good run. I think there would be some random questions Corey may not know but Aaron probably would, but he'd definitely give him a run for his money. No doubt.

What're your impressions of Rashawn Slater?

Bulaga: Very impressed with him. Putting my scouting hat on right now even though I'm not a scout, I think physical traits-wise, he checks all those boxes. I think movement and his footwork and how smooth he is in pass protection and run, those are all things that are good and essential, but I think so far from what we have gone through on the field and watching tape and seeing how he's picked up things, I'm very impressed by it. I think he's gonna be a guy that catches on really quick and is able to at least certainly get comfortable with the scheme before we go out there for the first time and do it for real. Obviously throughout any rookie campaign, I experienced the same thing, there's gonna be ups and downs, that's all just part of it. But everything that he's shown so far is positive and he's just gonna continue to learn, continue to grow, and continue to get more comfortable.

You mention it, you've been in that position before as a first-round, first-year tackle. What's the most important thing you could share with him?

Bulaga: I'm not gonna share all my secrets! But look, I've had a couple discussions with him already and that'll only get deeper as we get into training camp and get closer to Week 1. But for me, the biggest thing is being comfortable with the scheme, be comfortable with what your assignments are. If you're on (the same) page with what you're supposed to do, you can go out there and play fast. If you're kind of unsure about either an assignment, or a look, or something, it only causes you to play slower and I can assure you the guys across from us are not playing slow! I think for him, just make sure you're always mentally on top of what you need to do. If you have questions, you have a lot of guys in the room who've played a lot of ball. Especially in the offensive line room, no question is a bad question for us, we've all experienced it, or gone through it, or seen it.

It's gotta be a good feeling because he's coming into a pretty veteran group. It's funny because it's only your second year on the Chargers, but you're the elder statesman on this offensive line. Most of the other guys are new. So that's gotta be a good situation for Slater in terms of having that veteran leadership, presence, and guys to lean on.

Bulaga: Right now, having (Matt) Feiler next to him who's played a lot of ball. He's a good veteran, he's as solid as they come. Obviously, Corey just a yard or two down from him being able to help him out with things is enormous. I was very fortunate when I was a rookie (in Green Bay) I had Josh Sitton next to me. He was an All-Pro, Pro Bowler, and I got to play with him for a while before he moved to left guard. Then I had T.J. Lang next to me. Being able as a rookie to be next to a veteran who understands football in general and help you out with what to expect is definitely beneficial. It can calm your nerves a little bit, even though it's not gonna help totally cause at the end of the day, the nerves are always gonna be there! But I think it's definitely gonna be helpful for him to have guys playing with him and next to him and helping him out.

We talked about Corey Linsley, but then Jared Cook joins this team. Kyler Fackrell joins this team. All of a sudden you have these former Packers coming out west! How crazy is that?

Bulaga: You know, it's good to see familiar faces. And that's something that I can definitely get behind, familiar faces. These aren't guys they just picked up out of anywhere. These are guys who have played a lot of football. They're proven. They've done a lot of good things throughout their careers. I'm excited to have them. I'm looking forward to once we get into training camp and being with these guys every single day for hours on end, I'm looking forward to it. I think they're gonna make a big impact on the team.

And lastly, in 2021 what do you hope to accomplish this season?

Bulaga: Look, as offensive linemen, we're not really "me" guys, we're more "we" guys. I think everyone would say this, everyone has personal goals and that's all good. But I think number one is win. I think last year, a lot of guys have a bad taste in their mouths, and I wasn't here the year prior, but no one likes losing. It's not fun. It's not enjoyable. It's tough to go to work every day when you're not performing well and you're not playing well and things aren't going your way on the field. It's tough.

So I think it's winning. It's what everyone wants at the end of the day, it's the end goal. Obviously, guys have personal success and that adds to winning. That helps the team win, when individuals perform well. But us up front, we work in unison. When someone's having a bad practice or a bad day, it reflects on everybody. So it's our job to make sure that all of us up front are doing our job and performing well because that's only gonna benefit Justin, the backs, and the receivers. For me personally, I don't really have any (goals), I just wanna win. And I'll do everything in my ability to help this football team win and perform better.

JARED COOK

Connection with Chargers new coaches made Jared Cook deal come to pass

Los Angeles Times
March 22, 2021*

He has been an NFL coordinator one other time and for just 23 games.

So there's still uncertainty about what exactly Joe Lombardi will bring to the Chargers' offense in 2021.

There is no question, however, that he helped deliver the team's new tight end.

Jared Cook explained Monday that he signed with the Chargers in large part because of his relationships with Lombardi and offensive line coach Frank Smith.

"I think it's important to have coaches who understand what type of player you are; who you are as a person," Cook said. "Being with those guys was huge."

Cook, who turns 34 in April, is entering his 13th season. He replaces Hunter Henry, who departed via free agency for New England, and represents an experienced inside threat for young quarterback Justin Herbert.

For the last two seasons, Cook was with New Orleans, where Lombardi was the longtime quarterbacks coach.

Cook spent 2017 and 2018 with the then-Oakland Raiders. During the latter season, Smith was his position coach.

The two have kept in touch since, Cook saying Smith made a lasting impression because of his coaching style, particularly his willingness to listen to players and "not be a dictator but actually be a coach."

In 2018, Cook had a career year, finishing with 68 receptions for 896 yards and six touchdowns. He also made his first Pro Bowl, an achievement he duplicated in 2019 with the Saints.

The Chargers will need production from Cook coming off a season in which Henry emerged as one of Herbert's most-trusted targets.

With Keenan Allen and Mike Williams at receiver and Austin Ekeler coming out of the backfield, Cook will be a big body — 6 foot 5, 254 pounds — roaming along the seams.

He has 22 touchdown catches over the last three seasons, including a career-high nine in 2019. The Chargers haven't had a tight end produce as many as nine touchdowns in a season since 2014, when Antonio Gates had 12.

Asked what he'll bring to his new team, Cook said "a chance to kind of open up the offense a little bit more, spread the field ... exploit the mismatches when you're given them."

Along with spending two seasons with Drew Brees, Cook also played for one season — 2016 — with Aaron Rodgers in Green Bay. Having watched Herbert from afar in 2020, he said he appreciates all the potential.

"Justin Herbert also was a huge reason that I came here," Cook said. "He can sling the ball."

Chargers general manager Tom Telesco is in the process of rebuilding the line to better protect Herbert, overhauling 80% of the offensive front. Right tackle Bryan Bulaga likely will be the only returnee.

The team also has a new coaching staff headed by Brandon Staley, who hired Lombardi in January to be the offensive coordinator.

His only previous experience in that role was unspectacular, Lombardi fired by Detroit in October 2015 as the Lions failed to adapt to the scheme he was attempting to employ.

"I know what Joe brings to the table," Cook said. "He's a grinder. Joe will stay till four or five in the morning making sure your offense is ready to go. He puts in the time and he puts in the effort. I've seen it firsthand."

Chargers TE Jared Cook looks to make big plays with Justin Herbert

One of Jared Cook's favorite plays of his career was catching a 36-yard pass from a scrambling Aaron Rodgers near the sideline to set up the winning field goal in a 2017 playoff game against the Dallas Cowboys.

"Definitely a memorable play," the former Green Bay Packer said Monday.

Cook is entering his 13th season and turns 34 next month, but the veteran tight end said he's not done making acrobatic catches. He's already envisioning big plays in crucial moments with the Chargers and quarterback Justin Herbert, the reigning NFL Offensive Rookie of the Year.

Cook officially joined the Chargers on Monday after signing his contract, which is reportedly for one year with $4.5 million guaranteed.

"That's what the game is about," Cook said about creating memorable moments with Herbert. "It's about making those big-time plays."

"He can sling the ball, man. He came on last year unexpectedly when nobody was expecting him to be a starter and I think he did a really good job at that."

But Herbert wasn't the only reason why Cook joined the Chargers. The two-time Pro Bowl tight end is familiar with offensive coordinator Joe Lombardi and considers offensive line coach Frank Smith a good friend.

Cook had one of his best seasons in 2018 with the Raiders when Smith was the tight ends coach at the time. Cook recorded 68 receptions for 896 yards, six touchdowns and was named a Pro Bowler during his lone season with Smith. But Smith and Cook have kept in contact and texted often during free agency.

Smith recruited Cook and Lombardi provided familiarity. Cook spent the past two seasons playing for the New Orleans Saints, where Lombardi was the quarterbacks coach before joining the Chargers this year.

"I mostly talked with Frank Smith, but I know what Joe brings to the table," said Cook, who is joining his sixth NFL team. "He's a grinder. Joe will stay up until 4 or 5 in the morning making sure that your offense is ready to go week in and week out and he puts in the time and he puts in the effort and I've seen it firsthand.

"To be a part of that the past two years, really kinda made the decision easy. (Lombardi) was a big part of our success with the Saints – a huge part."

Cook wants to be a mentor to the younger players and learn from the skill players, such as wide receivers Keenan Allen and Mike Williams. Cook has played with star wideouts Michael Thomas of the Saints and Davante Adams with the Packers, but the veteran tight end said the Chargers' wide receivers are just as dynamic.

But Cook wants to do more than just be a leader. He sees a bright future for the Chargers' offense.

"A chance to help young players," Cook said for reasons why he joined the Chargers. "Also, a chance to be able to open up the offense a little bit more, spread the field, get on safeties and linebackers, exploit the mismatches when you're getting them and being able to score touchdowns and move the ball."

Familiarity with coaches draws Cook to sign with Chargers

By Joe Reedy

COSTA MESA, Calif. (AP) — Jared Cook has signed with a new team, and he will have two coaches who are very familiar with him.

Cook said Monday that offensive coordinator Joe Lombardi and offensive line coach Frank Smith influenced the veteran tight end to sign a one-year contract with the Los Angeles Chargers.

"I think it's important to have coaches that understand what type of player you are and who you are as a person. A lot of times in free agency that takes away some of the unknowns in visiting different teams," Cook said.

Lombardi and Smith were hired by new head coach Brandon Staley. Cook said he was in contact with Smith and Lombardi throughout the free agency process.

Smith was the Raiders' tight end coach the past three seasons, including in 2018 when Cook made the Pro Bowl for the first time and set career highs for catches (68) and yards (896) along with six touchdowns.

"He gets to understand your thought process while playing the game at 100 miles per hour so that he can better understand you as a player and be able to coach you better," Cook said of Smith. "I think that's important. Because Frank laid out that type of relationship, me and him have always kept in contact."

Cook's previous two seasons were in New Orleans, where Lombardi was the quarterbacks coach. Cook had a career-high nine TDs in 2019 and then had 37 receptions for 504 yards and seven touchdowns last season.

"He was the big reason for a lot of our gameplans — really, most of our gameplans. He would go break down film for us, then deliver everything that he broke down," Cook said. "He would also be the guy that's up in the box telling us everything that he saw during the game. His tutelage, his football IQ is very high."

Cook said he hopes to be able to help the offense spread the field and create mismatches with safeties and linebackers. His 22 touchdowns over the past three seasons are second in the league among tight ends. He is expected to fill the void left when Hunter Henry signed with the New England Patriots.

Besides Cook, the Chargers also have Stephen Anderson and Donald Parham on the roster at tight end.

Offensive guard Oday Aboushi also had his first availability since agreeing to terms Saturday on a one-year deal. He lined up mostly at right guard last season in Detroit, but he said the coaching staff hasn't told him which side they have in mind for him with Los Angeles.

"Last year, earning the opportunity to go in there and start — starting and playing the way I did at that level — just gives you more confidence moving forward and what I can do better next season," he said.

MICHAEL DAVIS

The Chargers' main 'Vato': Michael Davis' background inspiration for his NFL success

By Shelley Smith
March 31, 2021

COSTA MESA, Calif. -- There was a time in Michael Davis' life he wasn't sure where he'd be now. But where he is now is a pretty nice place, having just signed a three-year deal worth $25.2 million ($15 million guaranteed) to stay with the Los Angeles Chargers and be close with his mother and son.

"She cried," Davis said about his mom. And he cried along with her.

Nothing like home. Other teams offered more money. But none of them could offer the family-like dynamic that the Chargers possess. And it is the inspiration of family which has helped Davis emerge from being an undrafted free agent in 2017 to a key member of the Chargers' defense moving forward.

Davis was raised by his mother, Ana Martinez, who is from Mexico. His father, who was never in the picture, is black. He identifies with his Mexican heritage down to the tattoos of Emiliano Zapata, a Mexican revolutionary, on one leg and Mexican artists Diego Rivera and Frida Kahlo on the other. He's fluent in Spanish as well and loves the nickname that Chargers safety Jahleel Addae gave him during his rookie year in 2017 - - "Vato," which means dude, homeboy or friend.

It stuck. Now everybody calls Davis "Vato."

According to information provided by the NFL in 2019, 41.1 percent of Chargers fans are Hispanic, the largest percentage of any NFL team. Davis was a huge favorite when the team visited Mexico City in November 2019 for a Monday Night game against the Kansas City Chiefs in Estadio Azteca, a stadium Davis used to visit on trips with his mother. Davis dreamed of playing soccer in Estadio Azteca and says that playing there it was a dream come true.

He was raised in Glendale, California, by his mom and excelled (when he wanted to) in track and football at Glendale High School. Davis admits to not always being as motivated as he could have been, but his talent was evident. He was first team all-CIF in track and field in his senior year, won the Pacific League title in the 100-meter sprint three straight years and the 200 meter sprint four straight years.

His football career was far different -- Glendale won just six games in three years and recruitment was limited ... except for BYU athletic director Tom Holmoe, who appreciated Davis' speed and helped recruit him to Provo, Utah. Davis struggled at times with BYU -- temporarily losing his starting position as a senior to a time to a freshman -- but came off the bench to make an interception and 40-yard return against Michigan State that year, helping the Cougars to a 31-14 victory.

Davis' measurables -- he stands 6-foot-2 and runs a 4.4 in the 40 -- caught the eyes of the Chargers, who signed him after he went undrafted in 2017. Not being drafted created a chip on his shoulder that former Chargers DB coach Ron Milus noticed and honed. That's when Davis says that he started to realize what was possible on the football field.

"I think Ron Milus molded me into a corner," Davis said. "On top of that, I had to work on mentality. It's all about the mental game in the NFL, just those two things."

Davis' talent was showcased this past season after getting a pick-six off Tom Brady, taking the interception 78 yards for a touchdown. That's when things started to click, Davis said. He had a great follow-up performance against the Saints on Monday Night Football a week later.

"I started performing at my highest, at my best," Davis said. "Since then I was like, 'You know what? I actually have a chance to get an extra contract and hopefully stay with the Chargers.'"

Davis started 14 or 16 games for the Chargers in 2020 and had 62 tackles along with and three interceptions for 86 yards (the 78-yarder vs. Brady certainly helped in that department).

And that is a good thing for new head coach Brandon Staley, a former defensive coordinator who relies heavily on the secondary and likes to mix things around. And what Staley has in Davis is a wily veteran able (and more than willing) to pass on knowledge to younger players.

Staley told Davis he wanted to maximize his potential further, something that Davis likes to hear.

"They want me to take it to the next level with my game," he said. "I'm excited for that. I'm a little nervous, but I'm excited."

Davis is a father, as his son, Atticus, is still young enough to see his father in his prime, or what should be his prime.

Oh, and one more accolade: Davis spent four years as a tenor on his high school a capella singing team. So if you need a really speedy player with great hands and a high voice -- not to mention a nice salary for the next three years -- Davis is your guy.

Back in L.A., Michael Davis Ready to Go 'Next Level'

The first defensive player the Chargers agreed to terms with during free agency was one of their own.

Cornerback Michael Davis will return to Los Angeles on a multi-year contract, the team announced on Monday. The Glendale native, who began his NFL career with the Chargers as an undrafted free agent in 2017, has developed into a dependable starter.

New head coach Brandon Staley sees even more.

"Staley just told me that they're going to try to maximize my talents," Davis said. "They're going to work with me and try to maximize my potential. That's about it. That's what I'm hoping for – I'm hoping that he can take my game to the next level."

Davis has made 35 starts over the last three seasons. In 2020, he led the team in passes defended (14) and interceptions (3).

Can't-Miss Play: Michael Davis Reads Tom Brady's Throw for Speedy Pick-Six
In Week 4 against the Super Bowl Champion Tampa Bay Buccaneers, Davis picked off Tom Brady and returned it 78 yards for a touchdown. It wasn't until the following week, though, that Davis said he started to play his best ball.

"In my mind, it might have been the Saints game" he said. "Up until the Saints game, I was struggling a little bit with consistency. Then, after the Saints game, I think that's when everything clicked. That's when everything came together and I started performing at my highest, at my best. Since then, I was like, 'You know what? I actually have a chance to get an extra contract and hopefully stay with the Chargers.'"

Davis, who turned 26 in January, credits former defensive backs coach Ron Milus for developing him into the player he is today. The BYU product said he "wasn't really a corner yet" until Milus became his coach.

Things will be different for Davis in 2021. Four years ago he was fighting for a roster spot. Now, he's now the longest-tenured member of the Chargers secondary.

Former coaches and teammates have moved on. But as he enters the prime of his career, Davis has an opportunity – with an assist from the new staff – "to take it to the next level with my game."

He'll also have a trio of Pro Bowlers to help him get there.

"We're getting D.J. [S Derwin James Jr.] back" he said. "There will be me, D.J. – obviously, we still have [CB] Chris Harris [Jr.]. We have [DE] Joey [Bosa]. I think our defense is still going to be stacked. We're still a young defense, and I think we can come out and kick some ass."

Chargers DB Michael Davis seeks to maximize potential with new 3-year deal

By Gilbert Manzano

March 17, 2021

Michael Davis returned to his BYU stomping grounds Monday to clear his mind while NFL teams contacted his agent about possibly having the cornerback play for a team not named the Chargers.

"I was just kinda mad that I actually didn't know what was going to happen," Davis said Tuesday. "I just hate not knowing the unknown."

Davis' uneasy feeling didn't last long because his hometown team also called – the one that helped groom the Glendale native from an undrafted free agent to a prized free-agent cornerback.

Davis passed on bigger offers from multiple teams and remained with the Chargers to stay close to his family. Davis agreed to terms on a three-year deal that is reportedly worth $25.2 million with $15 million guaranteed.

"I came up here to Utah just to try to get away from everything," Davis said. "I had a few teams interested, but to be honest, I wanted to stay home. I'm a Cali boy and I'm close to my family and I'm just happy the Chargers called."

Davis, 26, had a long path before securing a second long-term NFL contract. He was raised by a single mother, Ana Martinez, a native of Mexico, and attended Glendale High before playing at BYU. Davis joined the Chargers as an undrafted rookie in 2017 and made the 53-man roster as a special teams contributor.

"She cried," Davis said about telling his mom the good news Monday. "She's very happy because she knows that we've been through a lot. I'm just happy to see her happy. She's happy I'm able to stay home."

Davis received his starting opportunity midway through the 2018 season, but he says it wasn't until after Week 5 against the New Orleans Saints last season when it finally clicked for him. He was no longer the inconsistent cornerback with size and speed.

"Up until the Saints game, I was struggling a little bit with consistency," Davis said. "Then, after the Saints game, I think that's when everything clicked. That's when everything came together and I started performing at my highest, at my best. Since then, I was like, 'You know what? I actually have a chance to get an extra contract and hopefully stay with the Chargers.'"

Davis is eager to return to Southern California to sign his new contract and celebrate with his mother and son, Atticus.

But Davis will be greeted by a new head coach in Brandon Staley and will play with new teammates in the Chargers' secondary.

Cornerback Casey Hayward was released last week and safety Rayshawn Jenkins is expected to sign with the Jacksonville Jaguars.

Davis isn't sure what his role will look like in 2021, but he's expecting his play to reach the next level under Staley.

"Staley just told me that they're going to try to maximize my talents," Davis said. "They're going to work with me and try to maximize my potential."

AUSTIN EKELER

Austin Ekeler continues to 'pound' his way toward NFL elite status

By Jeff Tomko
Muscle & Fitness Magazine
June 15, 2021

Based on social media postings, running back Austin Ekeler looks awfully ready for the 2021 NFL season.

His Los Angeles Chargers teammates nicknamed him "Pound for Pound" — as in pound for pound the strongest player on the team's roster. The principle behind the 5'8", 200-pound pass-catching powerhouse's weight room wonders is his allegiance to what he labels a "guerilla style" training regimen.

Other athletes have gone all in with teams of experts customizing innovative percentage-based formulaic workout programs, as well as incorporating high-tech fitness trackers to document each night's sleep patterns and other health variables. Ekeler, meanwhile, sticks with his unorthodoxly old-school approach to working out: He lifts based on how he feels that day. "That tech stuff isn't for me," he says. "To me, it's all over the place. I have an idea of what I'm trying to get done in the gym and how my body is going to react."

That mind-body connection — as well as a ton of football talent — helped elevate Ekeler from an undrafted free agent in 2017 to becoming the Chargers No. 1 back in 2020 after signing a multi-year, $24.5 million contract following a breakthrough previous season.

Expectations for 2020 were set higher than his NFL Combine vertical leap (40.5 inches), until a freakish hamstring injury kept him out nearly half of last season, in which the Chargers finished 7-9.

"The hamstring injury was the longest I've ever had to sit out," Ekeler says. "In my head, I was sad — and in a lot of pain. But at the same time, I had a pretty good run at making it through every season."

Six months since the season ended, Ekeler says he's now back to 100 percent — he shared the proof on social media. It's also given him time to work on building his brand for broader audience. Having recently moved to Las Vegas, his foundation — Austin Ekeler Foundation — recently helped build a gym for a local high school. He's developed other diverse ventures as well, including part ownership of the "Flying Aces," a team in the FCF, a fan-controlled football league in which online participants get to call the plays, as well as an owner (and designer) of an online bottle lamp company.

And while technology has no place in his workouts, Ekeler has nearly 30,000 Twitch followers, where he's a constant participant. "I wouldn't say anything's changed," he says. "I've just had more access to resources. All the stuff that I'm involved with is my way of helping the people around me and my community."

But football — and football training — remain his top commitments. Even with a busy extracurricular schedule, it's impossible for Ekeler to ever skip a workout. That's good news for optimistic Chargers fans heading into training camp with re-energized expectations as Ekeler's return and 2020 Rookie of the Year Justin Herbert entering his second season make for a potentially explosive offense under new head coach Brandon Staley.

"Training is how I got to this point," Ekeler says. "I've done this my entire life. It's how I operate. I need to work out pretty much every day."

ROAD TO RECOVERY

As a 2017 undrafted free agent out of Western Colorado, Ekeler surprised everyone in 2019 by catching 92 passes for just under 1,000 yards and rushing for nearly 600 yards and 11 total touchdowns while sharing running back duties with Melvin Gordon.

His breakout season not only earned him a four-year deal worth $24.5 million, but the franchise also shipped Gordon to Denver in 2020, establishing Ekeler as the team's full-time running back.

The bar was immediately set high, but by Week 4, the worst-possible scenario took place against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. Ekeler tore his left hamstring trying to jump back in an effort to evade a low tackle. "I immediately knew my hamstring wasn't OK," he says. "I almost passed out from the pain. It's one of the most painful injuries I've ever had."

He was placed on Injured Reserve, with a minimum eight-week recovery time expected. It kept him off the field, but no amount of pain could keep Ekeler out of the weight room. "I could still do upper body," he says.

But the main focus from Day 1 was getting back on the field — first step was alleviating the intense pain. Early on, Ekeler says he would go through 30 to 45 minutes of E-stim machine work on his left leg to get blood flowing. Each week, his progression slowly increased — he slowly began walking, then was able to stretch to help gradually increase his range of motion. "The goal was never to stretch past the healing point of the pain level," he says.

By Week 6, Ekeler, a self-described "quick healer," began performing single-leg Bosu ball squats, indicating to him at least that an early return was possible — until he tried running. "There was no chance that I could run," he admits. "I was going to need every bit of those eight weeks. Lucky there was bye week, in there." Ekeler finally returned in Week 12, pain-free, but when it came to football speed, he says he was nowhere near 100%. Despite missing nearly seven full games, he finished the season with 530 yards rushing and 54 receptions.

"I was feeling no pain, but I was definitely feeling slower, with no explosiveness after not running for eight weeks," Ekeler says. "But it's the NFL, you have to perform. So I was back on the field for that."

EKELER KNOWS SQUAT

Today, with training camp scheduled to begin on Aug. 1, Ekeler says he's at full speed — was evidenced by his first big test in the weight room — squats. His first time inside the weight rack, Ekeler stacked four plates on each side for what he called a solid triple.

"I was able to run at full speed, but I hadn't squatted in a while," Ekeler says. "I put some weight on the bar and it didn't bother my hamstring at all. So, I was like, let's try 405 for a few reps. I got three. That was pretty solid. Now I'm up to 13 reps."

In Ekeler's workout regimen, squats — heavy squats — are the foundation for the power and speed needed for football training. Although the weights keep increasing, Ekeler stays on the safe side by rarely if ever maxing out. He instead opting for three sets of three, usually at around 455 pounds.

But when he's feeling especially strong, Ekeler may toss a fifth plate and bang out a triple. "I feel like one rep is not really giving me that much," he says. "To me, three reps is better for my body — I don't have to put as much weight on the bar, which saves my knees a little bit."

Also a legday fixture for the running back are lunges. Since none of his workouts are ever repeated, Ekeler will always alternate variations, going from forward walking lunges on the turf to rear-elevated lunges.

Adding a power element to his training, Ekeler will oftentimes pair lunges with either a jumping movement or sprint out of a running back stance. "It goes from a power movement to straight-up explosive," he says. "I love that type of progress because it's exactly what football is like — you need to be strong and also be able to move explosively."

'GUERRILLA' MENTALITY IN A 'DRAGON'S LAIR'

Having recently moved to Las Vegas, Ekeler does his training at the newly opened Dragon's Lair Gym, owned by seven-time Olympia 212 winner Flex Lewis. While he says the atmosphere rocks, the bodybuilding-type workouts that go on aren't always suitable for his football goals.

"Dragon's Lair is sick," he says. "Because it's a bodybuilding gym, it's got a great atmosphere and a whole lot of really fit people. Seeing so many people who are bigger than me is extra motivation. But they work out way too long for me. They'll work out for two hours doing biceps [laughs]."

For football performance Ekeler sticks with an array of full-body workouts. Some exercises, namely squats, remain a staple in his development. But when it comes to creating NFL-level explosiveness, Ekeler says it's all about the power clean.

"Both hang cleans and power cleans are so much more beneficial for football players because it works like, 90% of my muscle mass — legs, back shoulders, biceps, grip," he says. "It's just a very explosive movement."

In his words, the more you can clean — taking the bar from the ground, slinging than catching it — the faster and more explosive you'll become, especially when you're blowing by — or through — 250-pound linebackers.

His advice for athletes: Get your form right. "I see people do clean that the gym and the form is usually terrible," he says. "Get your mechanics right."

Ekeler says building better form starts with adding accessory moves, like low pulls, high pulls, even front squats to elevate your cleans. Use low weight at first, he says. "If you work on those things, um, there's the progressions individually of the cleans while you're doing cleans too," he says. "It's going to help you build the actual fundamentals of the clean and help you clean more."

As a pro, Ekeler says he doesn't need as much weight to get the most out of power cleans. Instead, four to six reps at 225 pounds is sufficient for running back explosion and all-pro conditioning. "When I'm done, I'm exhausted," he says. "I might have to take a break between the reps — 15-20 seconds just to regroup. But it's a big powerful explosive movement. If you can do that, you're a pretty explosive human being."

Chargers' Austin Ekeler Launches Gridiron Gaming Group

By Trent Murray

January 27, 2021

Los Angeles Chargers running back Austin Ekeler has formally launched Gridiron Gaming Group, a streaming collective for sports personalities. The group will launch with six signed players — fellow Chargers players Mike Williams and Justin Jones, Philadelphia Eagles cornerback Avonte Maddox, Las Vegas Raiders long snapper Trent Sieg, New York Jets defensive end Bryce Huff and Los Angeles Dodgers pitcher Tommy Kahnle.

Along with Ekeler, each player will operate their own livestreaming channel on Twitch, leveraging Gridiron Gaming Group to promote their streams, collaborate with other athletes in the group and grow their individual communities.

To celebrate the launch, the seven members will participate in a special streaming event on the morning of Super Bowl Sunday, Feb. 7. The members will host a three-hour broadcast across their channels, engaging with one another and their communities through giveaways, Q&A, and other activities.

Over the last year, Ekeler has grown his personal Twitch channel to 22K followers streaming games such as Fortnite and Call of Duty. He has also broadcast a number of hours in the Sports category which Twitch launched last summer.

Gridiron Gaming Group was founded by Ekeler and Dynamic Sports Group President and CEO Cameron Weiss.

In the last year, collaboration between streamers has been proven to serve as the fastest way to grow a Twitch channel. By participating in a collective together, each of the signed athletes will be able to accelerate the growth of their individual channels by playing games together and interacting with one another.

KYLER FACKRELL

A Conversation With: Kyler Fackrell

July 20, 2021

This summer, we thought we'd check in with a few Chargers players before the 2021 season kicks into gear.

Our third conversation features Kyler Fackrell.

Fackrell is one of the newest members of the Chargers after joining the team this spring in free agency.

Here's more from Fackrell on why he joined the Bolts, thoughts on the defense, his reunions with a few former teammates, and more.

Welcome to the Chargers! I know it's been a couple months since you signed and you've now gone through the offseason program, but take us back, why did you choose to sign with this team?

Kyler Fackrell: It had a lot to do with coach Staley. I know Corey (Linsley) and I'm very excited to be back on a team with Corey and Bryan Bulaga. I was there (in Green Bay) with Jared Cook, too. Those are all great guys. But really, it was the conversation that I had with coach Staley and learning his passion for football and for defense and it was kind of the energy that he brings.

So shortly after you signed, Staley mentioned how much respect he had for your game coming from the time he spent in the NFC North coaching for the Bears while you were with the Packers. What are your impressions of him?

Fackrell: He seems really like a players' coach. Exactly what the players would want. I think he's very receptive to what the players want and is fluid in that way trying to make things right for us. We've kind of gone through the installs through this offseason and I think it's pretty clear that he's kind of a brilliant mind defensively. So, I think it's a great combination.

What's it been like getting acclimated to the Chargers organization and the teammates and coaches?

Fackrell: It's been great. They have a great group of guys. I think it's a pretty young team, there's kind of a select few vets, but overall, it's a pretty young team and a team I think that's really kind of hungry. They put together a group of guys who want to work and want to be great.

How does this defense really benefit your skillset?

Fackrell: I think getting the way coach Staley coaches this defense and the way they set up things is for us as EDGE players and for everyone to play fast and to get into one-on-one situations and favorable matchups, that's kind of what it's all about. It's gonna be great for me, for us as EDGE players, and for us on defense.

Staley mentioned your versatility, general manager Tom Telesco mentioned it, you just mentioned it as well. How has that benefited you throughout your career so far?

Fackrell: I think that's what kind of makes a 3-4 defense hard on offenses, when they don't know if the EDGE players are rushing or dropping. Obviously, most EDGE players want to rush and want to get sacks – and that's important – but being able to do both and to be able to drop into coverage and be reliable is a big strength.

Uchenna Nwosu said if anything goes wrong on the field, they can count on you. They're looking to you. You're new to this team but you're a veteran in this league. How does that veteran leadership benefit you and your role now?

Fackrell: I think other than Joey (Bosa) and me, who are the same year, the other guys in the group are young. I think experience really is a huge strength just having seen a lot of football and seeing what offenses try to do. I hope that I'll be able to pass some of that knowledge and little tips to those younger guys to help them get to that stage faster.

You mentioned some of those familiar faces (and former teammates) earlier. I was talking to Bryan Bulaga and asked if he'd ever anticipate having all these Packer reunions out west? For you, how helpful is it to have those guys out here in a new environment?

Fackrell: It's been great. I think especially being out here and out west, this is closer to where I grew up. I grew up in Arizona so it's a little more familiar to me. But again, kind of integrating in a new team and going to a team where you don't know anybody, it's good to know guys and have that "in" already.

What can you say about Bulaga and Linsley and if you got to know Jared Cook at all, and what they'll bring to this team?

Fackrell: They're gonna bring a ton of experience and a ton of knowledge. I think that was a big reason why Corey was brought in, too, to kind of work with Justin Herbert. They're great guys, they're great players. In the locker room, they're gonna be a great influence on what is a pretty young team.

And then lastly, what makes you most excited about being a Charger?

Fackrell: I mean everything. It's really a perfect situation for me, for my family. Being able to live here close to home, close to family, close to friends and all that. The organization has been amazing. I loved meeting with Tom Telesco and ownership. It's been great and I can tell already that it's a great group of guys, guys who want to work and break into that next level and make the playoffs and hopefully make a Super Bowl run.

MATT FEILER

Matt Feiler's Journey Defined By 'Grit, Ambition, Hustle'

April 13, 2021

Shortly after Matt Feiler signed a contract with the Chargers, his college, Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania, tweeted a summary of his journey to and through the NFL thus far – from Division II school to his new contract with the Bolts.

The words that accompanied the tweet, "grit, ambition, hustle," have defined that path.

"I definitely didn't see myself getting here," Feiler said. "It was always my dream to be a professional football player, but it never really crossed my mind. Especially, coming out of a D-II school, that I'd make it as far as I did. Looking back, I'm just grateful things played out the way they did."

Feiler's professional journey started in 2014 when he attended rookie minicamp with the Houston Texans as an undrafted free agent. He went on to spend that season on the team's practice squad. Fast forward to the following year, and the Pittsburgh Steelers claimed him off waivers from Houston and then signed him to their practice squad. He spent the next five seasons in Pittsburgh, eventually earning an active roster spot and then assumed a starting role midway through the 2018 season at right tackle. In 2020, he became the team's starter at left guard.

Feiler credits training in the weight room and developing more of an understanding of schemes as keys to his progression in this league.

"He's productive, reliable, and position flexible," mentioned Chargers assistant offensive line coach Shaun Sarrett.

Sarrett was with Feiler in Pittsburgh and the two have reunited out here with Sarrett joining head coach Brandon Staley's staff.

"It's another person here to make things more comfortable for me," Feiler mentioned. "Just having a familiar face here and someone who (you) can help lean on to help you find stuff or ask questions makes you feel more comfortable."

The versatility that Sarrett discussed played a big part in Feiler coming out west. "Matt Feiler's a guy that I really value," mentioned Brandon Staley. "(He has) right tackle flexibility, played on the right side then goes into left guard. That's a huge stance transition for a player, but he did it seamlessly ... We felt like this guy knows what it takes ... I feel like we got him at the right point of his career where he still has a lot to prove."

But along with his skills, Feiler's journey has certainly molded him into the player and person he is today, and it's something he's bringing with him to this Chargers locker room.

"He truly is a 'team' before 'me' guy," Sarrett continued. "He is the type of player that doesn't blink in the face of adversity."

Communication is Key for Matt Feiler & Corey Linsley

By Hayley Elwood

March 19, 2021

"We've got to get better up front, some of it is talent. There are different ways to approach that."

That was general manager Tom Telesco discussing the state of the Chargers offensive line shortly after the 2020 season ended.

Fast forward two months, and the Chargers approached some help via free agency with the additions of Corey Linsley and Matt Feiler.

The All-Pro center, Linsley, joins the Bolts after spending the last seven seasons in Green Bay. Feiler spent time at tackle and guard during his tenure in Pittsburgh with the Steelers but will play guard for the Chargers.

Linsley adds to the veteran presence on the offensive line and detailed what qualities he's bringing out to L.A.

"I try to communicate as quickly as I can," Linsley said. "I feel like that's the most important thing for a center, (is) to be able to identify the front and get everybody on the same page as quickly as you possibly can. That's something that I've taken pride in."

"It takes everybody, but when we get up to the line of scrimmage, my most important job is to get everybody on the same page. If guys have questions, communicate with everybody on the offensive line — and the quarterback, as well — effectively. Communication is key. I can reach guys in pass block, but it doesn't mean anything if everybody isn't on the same page and we're all going in different directions. That's the biggest thing on my plate that I have to take care of."

Feiler brings versatility not only with positions but with sides of the line as well, as he mentioned he's played both on the left and right. He also worked his way from undrafted free agent to starter in the NFL and credits Hall of Fame guard Mike Munchak, who was Feiler's offensive line coach for a few seasons in Pittsburgh, for his success.

But as he now joins this Chargers line, he, like Linsley, referenced the importance of communication as they adjust to working together.

"As long as we keep the communication open between everybody — to me, that's the way that we all get on the same page and have the same goal," Feiler said. "Once we all get the same goal and the same mindset, everything will start clicking."

ALOHI GILMAN

Kahuku grad Alohi Gilman set to give away 200 LA Chargers cleat to his community

By Cody Krupp
KITV Island News (Hawaii)
January 26, 2021

Every time LA Chargers rookie Alohi Gilman walked into their team facilities there would be a big crate of cleats sitting there. His first thought was his hometown, the tight knit community of Laie.

As the saying goes "one man's junk is another man's treasure." Tomorrow the Kahuku grad will give them away, maybe making a dream come true to those that were not long ago in his same shoes.

"Being raised in a small town, we don't have nothing. We use cleats till they break, till they have holes in them so I just asked them if I could get all these cleats at the end of the year and that's how the idea started," Gilman said.

Gilman was taken in the 6th round of this past April's NFL Draft, just seven picks after practically his next door neighbor Bradlee Anae was drafted by the Dallas Cowboys.

The community then organized an epic drive by parade and made their way from Laie to Kahuku and Haaula. Now Gilman has put together his own drive by event, but instead of a parade it is a drive way cleat give away. Starting tomorrow at 4pm will give out about 200 Chargers game or practice worn cleats to the community he credits for in getting him to where he is today.

"Anybody is welcome doesn't matter what age you are, it is first come first serve basis. Got some magic cleats in there right now some of my teammates are in there with their names on it still. For me if I were a kid and were able to get a pair of Keenan Allen cleats or one of my idols or any NFL player with not having much just having that alone even if it was a size to big I probably would have loved it cause it's something I would be able to be motivated with," Gilman said.

The former Notre Dame now Chargers safety played mostly on special teams as a rookie this season but did make his first career start in week 17 against the Super Bowl bound Kansas City Chiefs. A career high three tackles and hit the quarterback for the first time but had to leave late in the game to be evaluated for a concussion.

JUSTIN HERBERT

The magic and mystery of Los Angeles Chargers quarterback Justin Herbert

By Mina Kimes
ESPN.com
September 2, 2021

EUGENE, ORE. — Let's talk about the haircut.

Justin Herbert looks away, visibly distraught. Not because he's embarrassed by the haircut in question -- in December, he showed up at a Chargers news conference looking less like a golden-haired surfer god and more like a military school cadet, a visually awkward transformation that launched a thousand memes -- but because talking about the haircut means he has to talk about his least favorite subject, the one that he's been trying to avoid ever since we sat down for breakfast: himself.

Herbert stabs his pancakes with a fork. "So John Lott, our strength and conditioning coach ... he said, 'I cut my son's hair all the time.' I was like 'Sweet, you can cut mine.'" He shoves a bite into his mouth. "He cut it in the weight room, and ... that's kind of it."

But why would you let your strength and conditioning coach ...

He shrugs. "I just didn't really want to pay for a haircut, to be honest."

Offensive Rookie of the Year, $27 million contract, face of a newly relevant franchise. And yet.

Herbert's hair has grown back, but he still looks younger than his 23 years, hunching over his plate like the biggest kid at school. He's dressed in a T-shirt and shorts that were probably sent to him by Nike; he drives an Audi sedan that was definitely a gift from an auto dealership here in Eugene (he drove it more than 13 hours from Los Angeles). Later, when I point out a Whole Foods from the car, he says he doesn't shop at the grocery store because it's too expensive. "It's just calories," he explains.

Herbert barely looks at social media. He doesn't tweet, and only joined Instagram at the end of college, when his marketing representatives made him sign up. "I don't really run it," he tells me, a little sheepishly. When I mention his public persona is somewhat inscrutable, he seems pleased. "I think the less people know about me, the better," he says. "I don't want to read an article about myself."

Herbert glances at the tape recorder. We both laugh.

When the quarterback's representative told me we were meeting here, in a crowded breakfast spot on the fringe of Oregon's campus, I was curious to see how he'd handle interactions with fans. But in the hour or so since we've arrived, no one has approached him, save the waitress who keeps wordlessly refilling his coffee (Herbert, polite to a fault, stops midsentence to thank her every time). I ask him if he's surprised he hasn't been bothered, and he shakes his head. "I don't think people care a whole lot," he says.

That is, of course, preposterous. We're in Eugene freaking Oregon; Herbert's origin story is as woven into this college town's fabric (hemp, no doubt) as beer and bicycles and Phil Knight. And unlike Knight, he actually grew up here, in the shadow of Autzen Stadium, attending football games with his grandfather as a boy. Eventually, he'd star there as the school's quarterback, solidifying his local legend by returning for a senior season with the Ducks instead of entering the draft. His picture hangs on the wall of the restaurant where we're sitting, along with Oregon sports heroes like Sabrina Ionescu, Payton Pritchard and Marcus Mariota, all clad in green and yellow.

Herbert is friendly with Mariota; the former No. 2 overall pick, now a backup in Las Vegas, owns a house in Eugene not far from where Herbert's parents live. The two quarterbacks share a marketing agency, as well as a network of Oregon alumni and friends. And while their careers seem to be headed in different directions at the moment, their NFL journeys started in the same place, with the football world questioning their ability to lead.

If the draft is a marketplace of competing ideas, the league's disdain for quieter personalities under center is one of its staler tropes -- an investing principle that persists despite numerous counterexamples, as though introversion is tantamount to sloppy footwork or a wonky release. Herbert, with his generational gifts, could be the star whose success both catalyzes a scarred fan base and shatters the myth of the outspoken Alpha. But he's reluctant to clap back, demurring when nudged for comment on how he has been perceived. So I try a different tack, pointing out that Eli Manning, two-time Super Bowl MVP, was criticized early in his career for his reserved demeanor.

Herbert furrows his brow. "I wish I knew people on the Giants roster that could explain what Eli Manning was all about -- how he acted in the huddle," he says. "I bet when he stepped onto the field, he had control of the offense. Because he had to. And maybe he is soft-spoken off the football field, and maybe he doesn't love all the attention, but I don't think loving the attention and needing it is a requirement to be a good football player."

So, yeah: Justin Herbert doesn't want to talk about Justin Herbert. But that doesn't mean he has nothing to say.

When the Chargers' offense jogged onto the field in Week 2 last season, CBS play-by-play announcer Jim Nantz was stupefied. "Well how about this," he said to his booth partner, Tony Romo. "Justin Herbert's the quarterback on the first snap!" Nantz wasn't the only one surprised to see Herbert instead of Tyrod Taylor, the team's veteran starter. When tight end Hunter Henry saw the rookie in the huddle, he asked him what he was doing on the field. "I was like, just let me call the play," says Herbert, laughing.

The quarterback, like the rest of the world, didn't know at the time that Taylor had suffered a chest injury during warm-ups when the team doctor accidentally punctured his lung ("I felt horrible for him," Herbert says. "I wouldn't wish that on anyone.") Coach Anthony Lynn told the rookie less than 30 seconds before kickoff that he was starting in Taylor's place; as the news trickled through the sideline, star edge rusher Joey Bosa walked over and slapped him on the back.

The first drive was a blur. Because the pandemic had abbreviated the NFL's offseason program and eliminated the preseason altogether, Herbert, who operated exclusively out of the gun at Oregon, was unusually green. He spent part of the summer in Eugene calling plays in an imaginary huddle, his brothers Patrick and Mitchell radioing in messages using a walkie-talkie. Now he was lining up in SoFi Stadium, with the Chiefs' defense bearing down on him like homesteaders descending on untouched land. His teammates were awestruck. Easton Stick, the Chargers' third-string quarterback, recalls watching Herbert flip his protection early in the series and go through his progressions before checking down to running back Joshua Kelley for a 35-yard gain. "He had probably never done that a single time in training camp," Stick says.

Herbert blew everyone away in his debut, but L.A. lost in overtime to the reigning Super Bowl champs. Then, the next week, the Chargers lost again, and again ... going 2-8 over the next 10 games. Some of the losses were chaotic, and others a little freaky -- standard stuff in recent years for the Chargers, a team seemingly subject to the whims of a vindictive special-teams god. Still, optimism abounded. The results mattered less to fans than the performance of their young quarterback, and the early returns were strong. Despite playing behind a leaky offensive line, Herbert dazzled with his arm and his legs, Fred Astaire-ing his way through crowded pockets and launching bombs downfield. He broke Baker Mayfield's rookie passing record with 31 touchdowns, and the team ended the season with a four-game win streak.

While Herbert was taken sixth overall, behind Joe Burrow and Tua Tagovailoa, he did encounter a fair amount of skepticism during the pre-draft process. Many analysts admired his physical tools but questioned his decision-making; in his final season at Oregon, where he lacked elite weapons, the quarterback occasionally locked onto his first read before taking off with the ball. Over breakfast, I confess to Herbert that I underestimated him coming out of college, in part because I didn't properly account for the context around him compared to what Burrow and Tagovailoa were working with at LSU and Alabama. "I appreciate you saying that," he says, with a gentle smile. "It can't be easy."

Herbert says he generally tries to avoid consuming analysis or coverage of his career. Last year, the Chargers, along with the Rams, were featured on HBO's "Hard Knocks." Even though the rookie quarterback was featured in a few scenes, he says he skipped the series (Stick tells me Herbert tried to hide from the cameras). His teammates describe him as a homebody, more keen on watching movies -- he loves Christopher Nolan films, especially "Inception" and "Interstellar" -- and playing board games than going out. During camp last year, when the rookies were quarantined together in a hotel, he insisted on buying a copy of Settlers of Catan, the Risk-like strategy game where players gather resources to accrue territory, for the group. Gabe Nabers, the team's fullback, says they played nearly every night. "He loves that game," says Nabers. "He'll do anything to win."

"The first time he lost, he looked at whoever won -- maybe Gabe or me or some other guy -- and said: 'That won't ever happen again,'" recalls Nate Gilliam, a guard on the practice squad. He giggles. "I was like, 'Uh, OK ... I just met you.'"

Before the season started, the three rookies moved into a house near the Chargers facility in Costa Mesa. Herbert's teammates say they quickly learned that their new roommate was a something of a neat freak, with meticulous handwriting, a color-coordinated closet and a thinly veiled distaste for any sort of mess. Nabers says he has seen Herbert's temper flare up only once, when Nabers tried to abandon his grocery store cart in the parking lot. "The first time we went shopping, I was like, 'Eh, I'll leave it right here,'" he says, pantomiming a gentle push. "And he said: 'No. Take it all the way back.'"

Herbert, who lives alone now (he recently adopted a cat, which he named Nova, after a weapon in the video game Call of Duty), doesn't dispute this characterization. "I like things neat," he says. "Things have a place, and they should be put back where they come from." His preference for order extends to the football field, where he loves feeling confident in his ability to sort through the mess on defense and Marie Kondo his way to a first down -- pre-snap recognition, in quarterback terms. One of his favorite moments as a rookie took place on a seemingly unremarkable play, when he recognized a defensive look from the Raiders, killed the call, then reloaded it after Las Vegas adjusted to his adjustment.

"It was like a game of chess," he says. "If you could do that on every play, every drive ..." he sighs a little. "I think that's where success comes from."

Perhaps. But it also came when Herbert was immersed in chaos -- dodging free rushers and hurling passes across his body, breaking the rules that apply to less gifted athletes. His private quarterback coach, John Beck, says Herbert's natural arm talent is what enables him to thrive outside of structure. "I feel fortunate to have been around some really good throwers," says Beck, who has worked with Matt Ryan and Drew Brees. "There aren't that many people on the planet like that."

If Herbert wasn't a professional football player, he'd probably be a doctor or a science teacher. His dad, Mark, taught high school biology; so did his grandfather, who lived near the family in Eugene. Growing up, he and his brothers used to spend hours at the pond by their grandparents' house, chasing snakes and trying to trap nutria, a rat-like species of rodent endemic to the Pacific Northwest. Holly, his mother, says Herbert used to bring home various animals as pets, including one fish that jumped out of its aquarium while the family was out and died. "He was devastated," she says.

After Justin and I finish breakfast, he takes me to his parents' house, a rambler where he and his brothers grew up. One of them, Mitchell, is visiting from New York (he's a student at Columbia medical school), so the two of us sit outside, on a dusty patio set in the backyard. Mitchell points to the stretch of lawn where he used to catch passes from his younger brother when they were kids. "He was just always so athletically gifted," says Mitchell. "Justin would never say this, but people knew he was different. That's just kind of how he's always been."

Earlier in the day, I had asked Herbert how he ended up playing quarterback growing up. In his usual self-deprecating manner, he told me it was probably because his dad was the team's coach; everyone else says he was an obvious athletic prodigy, the sort of kid who could sling perfect spirals when he was barely out of diapers. At 4, he was out-throwing older boys at track and field events. At 5, he was pulling off unassisted triple plays. His high school football coach, Lane Johnson, says he first witnessed Herbert's "Rookie of the Year"-like throwing power at a little league game, when a young Justin whipped off his catcher's mask to field a bunt, barehanded the ball and threw a kid out. At the time, he was in the second grade.

Holly says she has only one memory of ever getting a call about Herbert's behavior, when a teacher phoned her to ask if she could get him to go easier on the other kids at recess. Watching him play youth soccer was a little embarrassing, she says, because her son scored all of the goals. As a boy, she says, Herbert was equally reluctant to tout his own accomplishments. "When the spotlight was on him, it was uncomfortable -- he was not attention-seeking." Holly describes Justin as a classic middle child. "Sort of the odd man out," she explains.

Herbert's aversion to self-promotion explains, in part, why he wasn't more heavily recruited in high school. After breaking his femur at the beginning of his junior year, he shot up several inches, approaching his current height of 6-foot-6. One would think a kid the size of a power forward with a Howitzer attached to his right shoulder would've enticed football programs far and wide, but Herbert wasn't heavily recruited, in part because, well, he rarely left Eugene. He visited only one quarterback camp, at his dad's request, and told his parents afterward he didn't plan on attending any more. "I don't think he fully understood how unique of a talent he was," says Beck, who notes that Herbert also didn't compete in The Elite 11, the throwing event widely attended by the nation's top prospects. "He never knew how he stacked up next to everyone else."

In the end, Herbert ended up at his dream school, Oregon, cracking the starting lineup as a true freshman under head coach Mark Helfrich. Though the team was very mediocre, Herbert was clearly very good. But when Helfrich was fired, the new head coach, Willie Taggart, declined to name the young quarterback as the starter from the jump, kindling a faux controversy when he told the media he was looking for a real leader. From that point on, Herbert was relentlessly critiqued for his understated attitude, figuratively poked and prodded all the way until the Chargers picked him in the draft. The quarterback studied biology and scored numerous academic honors, with near-perfect grades. Was he too smart? An unnamed lineman told a reporter that Herbert was extremely shy. Could he steer a team? Someone wrote a cute story about how he started a fishing club in high school. Did he like fish more than people?! (No one actually said the last thing, but you get the idea.)

It had to be exhausting. Herbert never complained in public, but others did -- teammates, coaches, friends. Joey Harrington, the former Oregon QB who was also panned for his cerebral vibe, tells me he gets frustrated watching history repeat itself year after year. "I think people have an idea of what a quarterback or leader should be," he says. "But a lot of times in the NFL, people just want you to shut the f--- up and do your job. I don't care if you're trying to motivate me -- if you don't play well, you're costing me money."

I ask him if he has advised Herbert to ignore the noise, and he chuckles. "He doesn't really care. He doesn't listen to this s---; he just does him."

It's true that Herbert mostly ignored the discourse ahead of the draft. ESPN's Desmond Howard questioned his ability to win over a locker room compared to Burrow; the quote spread like an oil spill, but Herbert says he didn't hear it until the comments resurfaced this spring, after he won Offensive Rookie of the Year. He insists he didn't care -- but concedes he did have to answer pointed queries from NFL teams, some of whom shared similar concerns. "I'd go to a meeting and they'd say, 'Well, we've heard some issues about your leadership ability,'" he says. "I said, 'Listen, I'm myself. Ask my teammates.' I'd give them examples."

One of the stories he brought up, he says, was a moment from his performance against Washington State in 2019, when there was less than a minute left in the game and the team was down by one. "I remember being on the sideline and saying, 'We practiced this every Wednesday, the 2-minute drill. We're absolutely fine. We'll go out there, we know what we're doing.'" Herbert went 4-for-4 on passing attempts on the final drive, and Oregon won 37-35.

"If you can look people in the eye in the huddle and say we're fine when bullets are flying and things seem bad ... that's my idea of leadership," he says. "Being yourself. Not being a rah-rah guy. Being the same person always."

He doesn't deny that he's an introvert but contends that the label is widely misunderstood. Back in college, Oregon's offensive coordinator, Marcus Arroyo, gave Herbert a book called "Quiet: The Power of Introverts in a World That Can't Stop Talking." Herbert remembers a section about a developmental psychologist who studied hundreds of children, exposing them to stimulating noises and visuals as infants. One might expect the babies who eventually became quiet kids to turtle inward in response to hectic environments, he says, but the future introverts were actually the infants who wiggled and danced the most.

The book's author, Susan Cain, wrote: "It's as if they process more deeply -- sometimes consciously, sometimes not -- the information they take in about the world."

The day after I meet Herbert and his family, his current and former teammates descend on Eugene for a charity golf tournament he's hosting at a local country club, to benefit a nonprofit that funds youth sports programs. As the morning fog rolls off of the pines, Chargers wideout Keenan Allen, conspicuously dressed in a bright violet polo with matching sneakers, is sitting next to a buffet, plowing through a plate of biscuits and grits. I pull up a chair and ask him what it was like playing with a rookie quarterback after seven seasons of catching passes from Philip Rivers. "Phil has the knowledge, the experience," he says. "But as far as athletic ability?" He snorts. "It's not even close. The guy is throwing 70-yard bombs as he gets hit."

The wide receiver points to a play against the Raiders in Week 9 called X Tower. Herbert was supposed to throw the ball to Mike Williams on a post route, with Allen clearing space -- "running for the love of the game," he says. But when the safety abandoned his responsibility and left Allen in space, Herbert, who was looking to his left at a double-covered Williams, abruptly flicked the ball nearly 30 yards downfield to Allen, who was caught by surprise when it spiraled into his outstretched hands.

"Experienced quarterbacks wouldn't even look at that route," says Allen. Herbert's extraterrestrial arm talent has made all of the receivers work harder, he continues, because no one can take any plays off. "Now, when you're the third guy on the team, you can't think ... OK the ball is going to Keenan, so you don't have to run your route. You can always get the ball at any point in time."

Herbert is Rivers' polar opposite in more ways than one. Allen can't remember a single instance of the rookie screaming in his presence; Rivers was, of course, well known for his antics on the field. "Phil's gonna yell every play," Allen says, cackling. "His team, the other team, he don't care. Phil yellin'." But the wide receiver is quick to point out that, for all of their ostensible differences, Rivers and Herbert share the same competitive fervor, it just manifests itself in different ways. During the Chargers' losing streak last year, he says, Herbert used to sit by himself at his locker for hours after games in full pads, eyes straight ahead. "I had to tell him, 'Bro: Let it go,'" says Allen. "It ain't got nothing to do with you. Leave it out on the field."

Allen pauses, then adds: "It's good to have a guy like that. You know he wants to win."

While the Chargers advanced to the playoffs seven times during the Rivers era, the team made it past the divisional round only once and never reached the Super Bowl. Even when the roster was stocked with talent, the organization seemed to be mired in perpetual misfortune, or playing out a Sisyphian drama where Rivers was doomed to lead endless comeback attempts, seemingly always culminating in a shanked field goal. Between the bizarre losses, the pervasive injuries and ownership's decision to skip town, Chargers fans could be forgiven for jumping ship. But then, Herbert entered the picture, and the franchise's prospects flipped overnight. While Kansas City still looms as the favorite in the conference, there's a sense among fans -- and analysts -- that Los Angeles could be a dark horse in the playoffs.

In a league where quarterback play matters more than ever, drafting a game-changing passer is a little like finding a working compass; no matter where you are, or where your team is going, you can always find your way north. Today, the Chargers' compass is posted up on the 10th hole, hitting the same shot over and over, exchanging pleasantries with every group that stops by his tee. Allen does a double take when Herbert smacks a perfect drive over the treetops, shaking his head. "Relax, my guy!"

Herbert grins. "Sometimes you get a good one, sometimes you get a bad one."

A few minutes later, Pep Hamilton, the former quarterbacks coach in Los Angeles, pulls up in his golf cart. Herbert hits an identical shot (I watch him take the same swing about a dozen times, and almost all of them follow a similar arc), and Hamilton, now with the Texans, whistles. "Jesus, Herbert," he says. "You been doing that all day?"

The quarterback shrugs. "I've had some good ones, some not-so-good ones," he says, tossing his driver in his bag.

As Herbert's Chargers teammates pass through, I pull them to the side, looking for insights. "He's like a sponge in the building -- eats everything up, absorbs so much info, wants to know the playbook more than anything. I mean, he's a biology major," says Scott Quessenberry, a backup guard. Herbert sidles up to us, and Quessenberry gestures in his direction. "He's like: 'Do you know the lifespan of organisms in the ocean?'"

"I've never said that," says Herbert.

Groups of golfers cycle in and out; the sun goes down and the tournament ends, giving way to a party next to the green. Hundreds more people show up for the festivities, lining up for barbecue and drinks and a glimpse of Dan Fouts. I spot Hamilton standing alone with a beer and ask him what it was like teaching Herbert last year. "I think he has a lot more in common with Andrew Luck than any other quarterback I've had a chance to be around in the NFL," says Hamilton, who spent just over two seasons as the offensive coordinator of the Colts. "He's a quiet leader -- he leads by example. He has an innate toughness about him, and he garners field credibility and respect as a result."

Hamilton smiles. "You can be tough without announcing you're tough."

We find a table and watch as a small crowd gathers around a makeshift stage, where a hired performer is playing covers of wedding songs. The singer strums the opening bars of "Sweet Caroline," then stops and calls for Herbert to join him. The quarterback shakes his head, but the guy won't take no for an answer, so Herbert trudges up the steps, where he's flanked by a couple of his offensive linemen. Before long, all of the Chargers still at the event have joined them; one of the linemen is belting out the chorus, the kicker is swaying with his eyes closed, and Allen is dancing with somebody's mom. A minute or so into the song, I spot Herbert fading into the background, then trying to slip into the crowd. So do his teammates, who pull him back on stage.

Justin Herbert went from ‘Justin Who?’ at Oregon to a Chargers standout in five years

By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
July 27, 2021

He went from No. 2 on his team to No. 1 in his league, collecting numerous franchise and NFL records during a wholly unexpected offensive rookie of the year season.

Stunning as it was, fast-tracking is nothing new to Justin Herbert, who arrived as the sixth-string quarterback at Oregon and bolted into the starting lineup only six games into his freshman year.

To appreciate how meteoric the rise of the Chargers quarterback has been, consider that it was in August of 2016 that then-Ducks wide receiver Darren Carrington called him this:

“Justin, the freshman from Eugene. I forget his last name.”

Just five years ago — Five! — even one of his teammates didn’t know it was Justin “Herbert.” This week — as the Chargers gather in Costa Mesa for the opening of training camp — all of football knows him ... and well.

Last season, Herbert produced more passing touchdowns (31), total touchdowns (36) and 300-yard games (eight) than any NFL rookie in history.

He finished with more yards than Aaron Rodgers, better accuracy than Patrick Mahomes and a higher rating than Philip Rivers.

He was at his best under pressure, on third down and in prime time.

So, entering Year 2, Herbert is expected to be, ah, better?

“There are no guarantees in this league,” said John Beck, Herbert’s personal coach. “There are a lot of guys on the other side of the ball getting paid a lot of money to stop you. And, as a quarterback, you need your teammates too. But, in terms of what Justin can control, he has a great chance to be an amazing quarterback in this league for a long time.”

The Chargers have a new coach in Brandon Staley and a new offense that is more nuanced and places additional responsibility on the quarterback. Herbert has admitted he has a lot to learn, even as a former straight-A student.

Beck, who works with Herbert at 3DQB in Huntington Beach, predicted any stalling in 2021 will be the result of the transition to a new scheme rather than the development of the orchestrator of that scheme.

“Justin’s going to be an improved football player, no doubt,” Beck said. “He’s certainly going to be a better quarterback. If there are circumstances where the road becomes bumpy, I would believe it would be him getting accustomed to the new offense and he and his teammates building chemistry in a new system.” Herbert, 23, faced few expectations last July. Yes, he was the No. 6 overall pick, but the Chargers already had veteran Tyrod Taylor and the full intention of starting Taylor for the foreseeable future.

Things changed in Week 2 when Taylor was sidelined by a pregame medical accident minutes before kickoff. Herbert started and performed convincingly enough that he missed just four offensive snaps the rest of the season.

Today, everyone is forecasting greater things as he prepares to operate behind a rebuilt offensive line projected to make Herbert’s life easier.

He suggested that muting the outside chatter won’t be a problem. Herbert insisted he’ll listen only to those whose opinions matter — family, teammates, coaches — just as he always has.

This is a player who grew up grounded in leafy, tree-lined Eugene, who has experienced broken bones and busted seasons, who had only one personal coach before joining up with Beck last year.

When he was in school, Herbert worked with one guy for one hour and, $100 later, told his father Mark that the money could be better spent elsewhere.

“The way you manage expectations is the outside expectations will never, ever, ever, ever approach your own,” Staley said. “We just focus on him being as good as he can be, on him being himself, not trying to be somebody [else].”

Herbert, according to those who know him well, never has been anything but himself, even in the aftermath of his glorious 15-game NFL debut.

He returned to Oregon this summer and hosted a charity golf tournament that benefited KidSports, a local nonprofit that provides athletic opportunities for children and is the place where Herbert first experienced organized football.

His tournament sold out so fast that the field had to be expanded. More than $150,000 was raised by Herbert and his fellow “celebrities,” a group that included star wide receiver Keenan Allen along with several other Chargers.

“I was as proud watching him give back through the golf tournament as I was watching him play last season,” Mark said. “There are just some bigger things in life. I think he’s on the right path to seeing that.”

Herbert’s father never expected his middle son to be an NFL star. The family lives practically within the shadow of Autzen Stadium, home of the Ducks and Herbert’s stated ultimate destination growing up.

The NFL? That’s a five-hour drive away in Seattle.

Until traveling to Denver to watch the Chargers in Week 8 last year, Mark hadn’t been to an NFL game since the late 1980s. He often has pondered how and why so much good has happened to his son so quickly.

He said he considered the professional fate of other notable Pac-12 quarterbacks — think Josh Rosen and Sam Darnold — and wondered, “Why him? Just dumb luck?”

“This is all new to us,” Mark said. “We’re just grateful and gracious that the path he’s on seems like the right one. We’re just parents happy that he’s succeeding. Whatever it is, we’re grateful for it and I think Justin is too.”

It is an adjustment, your unassuming son suddenly sought for television commercials and gaining fame for things such as his latest haircut or ability to barbecue brisket.

A couple of days before the show this month, Herbert turned to Mark and said, “Dad, did I tell you I’m going to the ESPYs?” Mark went online to find out his son had been nominated for an award.

“That’s the way he is about a lot of things,” Mark said. “It’s like, you don’t need to tell anyone how good you are. If you’re really any good, people are going to know.”

For a player who seems to have everything and more, Herbert has experienced empty moments.

He broke his leg in high school and missed most of his junior season. He fractured his collarbone as a sophomore at Oregon. His first Ducks team finished 4-8.

There were times in college when Herbert questioned whether he belonged on a Power Five football field. At the 2020 draft combine, he said he didn’t know if was ready to be a starter in the pros because he’d never played in the NFL.

That admission generated outside doubt, former linebacker and current television analyst Emmanuel Acho saying Herbert “could potentially be one of the biggest mistakes of the draft.”

Beck was instrumental in cultivating Herbert’s belief in himself, along with his talent. The two bonded quickly, Beck explaining that they are “both thinkers” and learned in humbled environments rather than at elite camps.

“You just simply played ball,” said Beck, 39, a former NFL quarterback.

“That’s how you came up. We both came from a place where nobody’s telling you how great you are. You’re just self-motivated.”

In June, about 16 months after Herbert admitted he didn’t know if he could play in this league, Staley said the most impressive thing about the young quarterback was his presence.

He called Herbert “a commander in the offense” and pointed out how comfortable he looks going into and coming out of the huddle and making calls at the line of scrimmage.

All of this adds to the growing notion that this should be a second NFL season more special than the record-setting first.

“Justin has all the tools that you would want,” Beck said.

“He’s a smart kid. He’s very determined. It means a lot to him to play well. He’s fully invested. ... He’s exactly what you want when you pick a franchise quarterback.”

At football’s highest level, Herbert is on his way to establishing his game, just five years after someone in his huddle didn’t know his name.

Acts of Kindness: Justin Herbert hosts golf tourney to raise money for Kidsports

By Kendall Bartley
NBC16 KMTR (Eugene, Ore.)
April 9, 2021

EUGENE, Ore. - It's where Eugene native Justin Herbert started his football journey - Kidsports, a local nonprofit providing youth sports programs for kids in our area.

Now the former Sheldon Irish and Oregon Duck quarterback is entering his second year in the NFL with the Los Angeles Chargers.

The hometown hero is now giving back to the nonprofit by hosting The Justin Herbert Golf Invitational.

"Eugene's always been my home and I've loved that community and they've given me so much," said Herbert. "If I have even the slightest chance at giving back and helping them, I'd love to do it."

The Justin Herbert Invitational is on July 8th. It has a huge goal of raising $100,000 benefitting Kidsports.

Bev Smith, the executive director of Kidsports was ecstatic: "First of all, it's incredibly heartwarming, and secondly, it just falls in line with the type of person Justin Herbert is and the family from which he leaned most of his values and principles."

Justin partnered with Kendall Auto Group, which is the presenting sponsor.

"When we partnered with Justin and talked about putting on an event that would help support the community, it didn't take any conversation at all for us to decide if Kidsports would be the right fit," said Amy Newport, the community relations specialist with Kendall Auto Group.

Kidsports was the program Justin grew up with.

"As Justin talked about an interview this year when he was going through some losing with the Chargers," said Smith, "he mentioned that he had learned the importance of winning and losing and how to manage that through Kidsports. So, really what we would like our kids to learn is that sometimes you win, sometimes you learn, and the rest of the time you should be having fun - and I think that's why Kidsports has managed to maintain its presence in the community for so long."

Kidsports is a fun program that builds friendships and stability.

As Justin explains, "I think it's huge because I take a look at my life and without football, baseball and basketball, I don't know what I'd do. I'd be in school and definitely learning, but football has been such a big part of my life and there are people all across the city that, given that same opportunity, they can shine. If we're able to provide that for them, I think it's a great opportunity."

Now, Justin is hoping this golf tournament will provide just that.

"All of the money, all of the proceeds will go to making sure that every kid will have a chance to play."

Smith explained what the money would mean to Kidsports.

"It would benefit us in all kinds of ways," she said. "Certainly we want and would love to fund free; we would love activities for children to be free, particularly for low income families, particularly families who have been affected by COVID-19 and the fires in our community. We try to find ways to get kids out here to play."

The goal of $100,000 can go a long way, and Newport believes they are well on their way with fundraising already.

"I believe I'm being conservative in saying that we are going to blow that out of the water."

The Real-Life Diet of Chargers Quarterback Justin Herbert, Who Lives on Subway Sandwiches

By Emily Abbate
GQ Magazine
November 19, 2020

The 2-7 Los Angeles Chargers are not having an amazing season. That having been said, their rookie quarterback Justin Herbert is doing an impressive job under center. He's being touted as the front-runner for offensive rookie of the year, and if you've got him on your fantasy team, you're probably doing a little dance every Sunday. The issue seems to be on the other side of the ball—the Chargers are excelling at blowing leads. Still, the former Oregon Duck says he's just grateful to be doing what he loves every single day.

"I'm honored to be playing for a great organization," he says. "Every week is another opportunity to play the game and I'm ready to get after it." GQ caught up with him recently to chat about his diet, which involves lots of team-catered meals and a steady rotation of fast-food sub sandwiches.

GQ: When are you up in the morning?

Justin Herbert: The day starts out pretty early. I wake up at about 5 a.m., immediately brush my teeth and head out the door. I live about 15 to 20 minutes away from the facility, and I really look forward to the drive because it gives me a chance to just listen to music and unwind.

I can't eat very much in the morning. I kind of have a weak stomach, so maybe I'll reach for a Gatorade protein bar or two. I usually stick with the chocolate peanut butter flavor. We lift at 6 a.m. for about an hour, and then we'll have a couple of meetings. I usually have just the right amount of energy to get through all of this, and then at 9:00 or 10:00, I'll have two slices of bacon, three eggs over easy, and two slices of wheat toast.

Are you big on hydrating?

Definitely. I drink a lot of water throughout the day. Normally it's about five or six bottles. I try to drink at least one right when I wake up. I think hydration is really important, and we've done a good job of integrating that.

When you say "we've done a good job," who is the "we" that you mention?

Well, we have a team nutritionist, but I really just mean the team. We make it a point to drink plenty of water.

Have you ever worked one-on-one with anyone to chat about your nutrition?

When I was training prior to the draft, I used a couple of food services that catered meals and had prepackaged meals ready to go for the day. When I did that, I was focused on low-dairy, low carb diets. It was a lot of protein. Now, since we're in season, I try to maintain my weight, and in that process I need to kick up the carbs a little bit.

What's for lunch?

We'll have whatever the team normally caters. So maybe it's a sandwich or it's rice and chicken—something along those lines. In the afternoon, I'll usually stop by the smoothie station that we have at the facility. In my smoothie, I put in strawberries, banana, mango, pineapple, Greek yogurt, and vanilla whey isolate protein powder.

So you're a fruit smoothie but a peanut butter chocolate protein bar guy?

I like to mix it up, you know?

And dinner?

At night after we get off, I normally just honestly stop at Subway. That's kind of what I've been living off for the past couple of weeks. Normally I'll get two sandwiches. One is a steak and cheese and then the other is the chicken bacon ranch, both on their Italian herbs and cheese bread. It's been working for me. It's a good thing to pick up on the way home.

When you're not grabbing Subway, what are some other things you may do for dinner?

If I have enough time, I'm definitely barbecuing. I've got a Traeger grill in my backyard and a bunch of Snake River Farms meats. Any time I get a chance to throw some of those on the grill, it's pretty great.

Do you have a sweet tooth?

I'm a big fan of mint chocolate chip ice cream and peanut butter cookies. But I've done a pretty good job over the past couple of months of staying away from that. Probably because I call it a night pretty soon after dinner, like at 8:10 or so. I get home at about 7:45. So I'll have dinner for like 15 or 20 minutes, and then it's always right around 8:10 that I turn the lights off.

That's pretty impressive.

I'm normally a night person and waking up early in the morning is not easy for me by any means. But it kind of comes with the job. It's something I have to do. So it's something that I've had to practice and it got easier over time. But it's still not easy at all.

Justin Herbert's misinterpreted personality becomes Chargers' gain

By Gilbert Manzano
Orange County Register
October 31, 2020

Jana Prikryl, the director of general science at the University of Oregon, didn't realize she had helped Justin Herbert change his major until a peer advisor identified him with a scream.

"Oh, my God, that was Justin Herbert," Prikryl recalled hearing when the 6-foot-6 Oregon quarterback left the office.

Herbert, now a star quarterback for the Chargers, submitted his change-of-major form to switch from biology to general science. Herbert was the second future NFL quarterback that Prikryl had assisted. Marcus Mariota was a general science major at Oregon a few years before Herbert.

"Embarrassingly, I did not know that he was Justin Herbert," Prikryl said in a phone interview last week. "I knew we had Justin Herbert and I knew he was fantastic, but I didn't put the face to the name."

Prikryl shouldn't be embarrassed. Not many knew of Herbert before he became a star at Oregon and the latest NFL rookie sensation.

Even now, as more become familiar with the name, not many truly know Herbert. Although, there were many guesses about his personality in the lead up to the 2020 NFL Draft.

Herbert was described as an introvert, also known as a shy person, and few NFL teams want a shy quarterback. But that didn't stop the Chargers from selecting Herbert with the No. 6 overall pick in April's draft.

They were well aware of Herbert's physical gifts, just like the other 31 teams, but perhaps the Chargers dug deeper in getting to know Herbert as a person.

"I think a lot of introverts get labeled with that word shy, lack of leadership," Chargers coach Anthony Lynn said. "My son is an introvert, so I raised one. I know what the tags are, but you just look at how people respond to them. That's all you need to know."

The Chargers did their personality research on Herbert and are now getting rewarded for it with weekly touchdown passes from his rocket right arm.

"Ultimately, this guy is just very talented," said Denver Broncos coach Vic Fangio, whose team hosts Herbert and the Chargers on Sunday. "Looks to me like he's made up of the right stuff to be a quarterback in the NFL, and fortunate for (the Chargers) and unfortunate for us, I think they found their quarterback for the next 10 to 15 years."

Herbert has only started five games, but he's played so well that questions are now being asked. How did a quarterback who is enjoying a historic NFL start that rivals Patrick Mahomes and Dan Marino become available at No. 6 for the Chargers?

Why didn't the Washington Football Team take Herbert second overall and why didn't other quarterback-needy teams leapfrog the Chargers in the draft order to take him?

Many draft experts described Herbert as having all the physical tools, but somehow that wasn't enough to shake the introvert label that hung like a dark cloud.

Of course, it wasn't all because of Herbert's quiet demeanor, but it likely played a part in why teams were skeptical, and it goes to show that swagger isn't everything. Sometimes saying less means there's more of other leadership qualities.

Herbert won't say teams got it wrong by passing on him and making him the third quarterback selected — that's not his personality — but he did say the introvert tag was incorrect.

"I wouldn't say that's fairly accurate," Herbert said. "I think on the surface it might appear that way, but when I really get to know people and the team, I think a lot of the guys on the team would tell you differently."

Many draft experts and talking heads have said they got it wrong with Herbert, but the Chargers should thank them because all the personality speculation they provided before the draft became their gain.

Herbert celebrated his first NFL victory against the Jacksonville Jaguars last week by giving star wide receiver Keenan Allen an enthusiastic slap on the behind.

"Yes, sir!" Herbert shouted at Allen.

That doesn't sound like a shy quarterback.

Here's how family members, teammates and former professors described Herbert as a person and leader:

THE REAL HERBERT

College recruiters also got it wrong with Herbert.

Herbert was a three-star high school recruit with no Division I FBS scholarship offers heading into his senior year at Sheldon High in Eugene, Ore. Herbert was set on attending Montana State to play with his older brother, Mitchell, before Oregon made an offer.

"He did not go to (football) camps because he practiced with his high school team," said Mark Herbert, Justin's father. "When other guys were looking for exposure to go to colleges, Justin was practicing with the little kid down the street that he'd grown up with or another kid he played middle school football with or somebody else because that was going to be their team in the fall."

Justin Herbert has a reputation for not looking ahead. He prioritizes the present and enjoyed it by playing baseball, basketball and forming a fishing club in high school.

In college, it wasn't all about making it to the NFL. It was also about improving as a biology student. Herbert agreed to be a biology professor's assistant even though it took time away from football.

But helping the little kid down the street and having extracurricular activities didn't help Herbert in the college recruiting process and it was probably ignored by some NFL teams.

Multi-sport prep athletes have become a thing of the past. It's now about specializing in one sport and getting as much exposure as possible by participating in 7-on-7 tournaments, creating Youtube highlight videos and announcing every college offer received on Twitter.

You can't find Herbert on Twitter, although he does have an Instagram account.

"He didn't enroll early (at Oregon) because he wanted to play his senior year of baseball with his buddies," Mark Herbert said.

Justin Herbert stayed in one place before the NFL called, never leaving Oregon while the university's coaching staff changed twice in four years.

Mark Herbert recalled being asked by a local reporter if Herbert would consider transferring if he lost the quarterback job when Willie Taggart replaced Mark Helfrich as head coach in 2017.

"What are you talking about?" the older Herbert remembered asking. "I don't understand the line of question. What's Justin going to do? Get his degree in biology, he's gonna play football and he's gonna go to medical school or he's going to go to the NFL."

"I don't know what he's going to do, but he's not leaving. That's not what Justin does."

Justin Herbert also didn't leave when Mario Cristobal took over in 2018 and then stayed for his senior season, despite being projected as a first-round selection.

Sticking around for an extra year to play with friends gave pundits more time to analyze Herbert as armchair psychologists.

He wasn't viewed as the committed teammate who wanted to help win a Pac-12 championship. Instead, he was the quarterback who struggled against Arizona State and lacked the alpha-male personality to lead an NFL locker room.

But Herbert proved in high school and college that he doesn't run from adversity and makes it work with what he has. Those are the leadership traits that went unnoticed, and he's showing it again in the NFL by elevating undrafted players such as Jalen Guyton, Tyron Johnson and Donald Parham and doing it without his top offensive linemen, Bryan Bulaga and Trai Turner.

Herbert gets everyone involved and is not afraid to ask for advice. But all of that was lost during the lead up to the draft and it became the Herbert family's gain.

Mark and his wife, Holly, were rooting for their son to play for the Chargers. They have family ties to Southern California.

Justin Herbert's paternal grandfather, Roger, played football and ran track for Fullerton College before transferring to Oregon State. Herbert's maternal grandfather, Rich Schwab, grew up in San Diego before playing football at Oregon.

"We looked at (the draft order), 'Hey, Los Angeles all the way.'" Mark Herbert said. "Oh my goodness, travel-wise, and family-wise, team-wise ... a lot of things pointing to the Chargers."

Mark Herbert credited the grandfathers for Justin's professionalism and said his son got plenty of good qualities from his mother Holly.

"I'd say Justin is fiercely loyal and fiercely focused and dedicated and definitely gets that from her," Mark said.

Justin Herbert's love for science likely came from his father, who was a science and biology teacher for middle school and high school students.

HERBERT, THE COMEDIAN

Chargers defensive tackle Linval Joseph played four seasons with recently retired Giants quarterback Eli Manning. The two-time Super Bowl champion was also described as an introvert.

Joseph sees similarities between Manning and Herbert.

"I felt like there was two different types of Elis," Joseph said. "You have funny Eli and then you have 'get the job done' Eli. Two minutes in the quarter, fourth quarter, need this drive and he woke up, and when he woke up, he made those big throws, made those big plays, and I see that in Herbert. I really do."

"I feel like he's going to have a great career and once we put everything in order, he's going to be elite. He's going to be great."

Chargers rookie wide receiver K.J. Hill can attest to Herbert's comedic side. Hill explained why Herbert was shown in a scene of "Hard Knocks" doing a lengthy "whassup" from the popular Budweiser commercials.

"I told him you gotta say the 'whassup' in the huddle," Hill said. "I told him to say it in the huddle before he called a play or something like that. It was something silly like that. He was practicing basically before he did it to get my OK if it was good or not."

Herbert and Hill texted each other after being drafted by the Chargers and have become close friends.

"Inside the locker room, (he's) making jokes, talking," Hill said about Herbert. "He has not been a quiet guy since I've been around him. We're always talking about anything and everything, so I feel like he got a great personality and great competitor side that I love about him, too."

Hill said he's a better "Call of Duty" player than Herbert, but he gave his quarterback the edge in golf.

"Justin likes to golf," Hill said. "I told him the only close thing I get to golf is Top Golf."

HERBERT, THE TUTOR

Mark Carrier, a professor at Oregon, was in need of a teacher's assistant for his Biology 212 course. Herbert was one of his best students, but Carrier assumed he didn't have time to teach the material to other students for the upcoming quarter.

"I figured no way a football player is going to have the time to do that, but in passing one day, I told him, 'Hey, you know if you weren't so busy being the quarterback of the football team I would definitely offer you this role,'" Carrier recalled.

Without hesitation, Herbert took the offer and assisted the class of about 200 students.

"It's a pretty interactive class time," Carrier said. "You can tell if people are going to hide what they know or help others along. Justin was the kind of guy who helped the people around him."

"It was clear to the people around him he understood the material more quickly than most. He didn't struggle as much as people tend to do. It's a very challenging course. He was very helpful to the people around him."

At the time, it wasn't certain that Herbert would be a top NFL draft pick. Carrier said Herbert expressed interest in a career in medicine or becoming a researcher.

"I was just really interested with how everything worked out (in biology) and science and kinda how your body processes things and kinda explaining the natural phenomena that happened around us," Herbert said.

Biology sounds as complex as breaking down NFL defenses. Herbert being able to grasp intricate material at a fast pace while also teaching it is perhaps another leadership sign (and an indicator of future success) that went unnoticed.

"That might be a reach, but it's a good analogy," Herbert said about comparing football to biology. "Having a good understanding of defenses, coverages and things like that. It definitely helps."

Herbert said his top passion has always been football. He'd said he would likely be a coach right now if he wasn't an NFL quarterback.

"Hopefully I'd be coaching the game or somewhere involved in the game," Herbert said. "I just love football too much to not be around it."

That's the real Justin Herbert. Passionate about football, but with other interests. Not the loudest, but a quiet genius with an occasional comedic side.

"I think he's more outgoing than what people give him credit for, but that's OK," Lynn said.

The Chargers said that's OK to Herbert's personality and now, as Fangio mused, they stand to reap the rewards for years to come.

Chargers' Justin Herbert learning he can't let the perils of running in the NFL slide

By Sam Farmer
Los Angeles Times
October 15, 2020

Justin Herbert, with his smooth throwing motion and surgical precision, has proven he's already a top-notch NFL passer.

Now, the 6-foot-6 Chargers rookie needs to work on his going-to-the-ground game.

He took off running in his first career game and clobbered Kansas City linebacker Damien Wilson when they collided near the sideline. Whereas Herbert nonchalantly popped to his feet, Wilson appeared knocked out cold.

Two weeks later, Herbert tore off a five-yard run against Tampa Bay and lowered his shoulder on Buccaneers safety Jordan Whitehead. This time, the defensive player got the better of the crash, as Herbert needed a few moments with his hands on his knees to compose himself. Whitehead was flagged for unnecessary roughness.

"Feet-first sliding is probably the best option I should go with," Herbert conceded later. "I grew up playing baseball so I feel like I'm pretty comfortable with sliding. It's a little tough on the grass, your cleats get stuck a little bit, but it's definitely something I've been practicing. Moving forward, I'll be better about it."

Chargers coach Anthony Lynn hopes so. He could be forgiven for watching replays of those collisions through his fingers while covering his eyes.

"Bad coaching by me right there, bad coaching," Lynn said. "I don't want him taking hits like that, like he did from the Chiefs. ... I want him to get down. I don't want him to take those hits in the National Football League."

Theoretically, Herbert could look across town for pointers from another young quarterback. The Rams' Jared Goff, the son of a former Major League Baseball player, has had sliding issues of his own.

In the two years since the NFL made a rule change — stipulating a quarterback doesn't have to slide feet first to be considered giving himself up, and instead is afforded the same defenseless-player protections when he dives forward — Goff has found himself getting "caught in between sometimes."

"I'm used to going feet first, and I have my whole career," Goff said. "And then in the last year or two, I want to go head first. I don't want to lose those three yards. But at the same time, you're kind of trying to figure out where your momentum is."

His father, Jerry Goff, who played catcher in the majors for six years, wishes his son would hit the deck more often, yet understands why he doesn't always do so.

"Do I encourage him to slide? Yeah, 100%," the elder Goff said. "But there are times, like he did in the playoffs against Dallas, and a few times in college, where you've just got to deal with it and go get that first down. You're not going to slide short in that situation. But I would say 90% or more, you're just going to slide and play the next down."

The dilemma is older than Red Grange. Should a quarterback risk injury by fighting for that extra yard, either by dropping a shoulder and delivering a blow, or by diving forward as a human missile?

Or should he sacrifice that extra yard or two and safely slide feet first?

"We've got to coach these quarterbacks out of the macho-man approach," said Hall of Fame personnel executive Bill Polian, who thinks all NFL teams should build sliding pits at their facilities to teach quarterbacks. "Playoffs are one thing; that's a different cat altogether. But in terms of the regular season, never lower your shoulder. Don't take those kinds of blows. The rule is there to protect you: Go slide."

Sometimes, even sliding feet first is unsafe. Last Saturday, Clemson quarterback Trevor Lawrence, the overwhelming favorite to go No. 1 in next spring's NFL draft, took a shot to the helmet from University of Miami safety Amari Carter while sliding. Officials ejected Carter for targeting.

In 2006, Kansas City quarterback Trent Green absorbed a brutal hit to the head from Cincinnati defensive end Robert Geathers while sliding feet first. Green suffered a serious concussion and the replay reverberated throughout the league.

"I remember being like, 'Yeah, see? I don't want that to happen. I would rather dive head first, I'm in control of my head,'" recalled former Seattle Seahawks quarterback Matt Hasselbeck, who took a ribbing from his coaches about his aversion to sliding. "I sort of remember being made fun of by Mike Holmgren and Jim Zorn about how I didn't slide, like I couldn't slide."

So Zorn, the former Seahawks quarterback who later coached the position for the team, unfurled a Slip 'n Slide at practice in hopes of teaching his passers how to avoid big hits by gracefully going to the ground. He even brought in Seattle Mariners first baseman John Olerud as a sliding tutor.

"The thing was, we knew how to slide," Hasselbeck said. "It wasn't like we didn't know. We just preferred to dive."

According to NFL rules, a defender must pull up when a runner gives himself up with a feet-first slide. If a defender already has committed himself and makes unavoidable contact with the sliding runner, it is not a foul unless the defender makes forcible contact to the head or neck area of the runner with the helmet, shoulder or forearm, or commits some other act that is unnecessarily rough.

But the runner bears the responsibility of starting his slide with ample time for the defender to pull up and avoid the hit.

"Pursuing a guy, I would give him the benefit of the doubt that he was going to slide," former Rams defensive tackle D'Marco Farr said. "But you'd better start that slide within two or three steps of me. Make it obvious. If not, I'm going to treat you as a runner that's attacking my goal line, which means I'm going to try to knock your teeth out."

The notion of sliding never appealed to Hall of Fame quarterback Steve Young, but not because he sought those extra yards at all costs. He just didn't feel that sliding provided him enough protection.

"My own philosophy was sliding was a nightmare," Young said. "Sliding is saying, 'Just hit me in the face.' I always thought it was much safer to go forward, find a soft spot forward."

What's more, Young said, officials routinely get the placement of the ball wrong when a player slides feet first.

"Inevitably, the referee gives you a spot farther back than you thought it would be, or than it should be," he said. "It's a weird thing. I don't know what sliding does that creates this image that the ball's downed earlier than it was."

"I always thought I got a better spot when I was going forward. It's like an optical illusion for them. When I slid, nine times out of 10 I'd turn around and say, 'Where are you marking that? That's not right.'"

Not surprisingly, some of the quarterbacks who had the option of playing pro baseball — notably Seattle's Russell Wilson and Arizona's Kyler Murray — are the most graceful sliders.

"I think playing multiple sports is a very big thing in terms of getting those extra yards, also being smart, getting down," Wilson, selected in two different MLB drafts, told reporters in 2017. "The ability to quickly slide, too. When you hit a ball in the gap, you've got to get to second base and get there fast. You've got to know where to slide, how to get around the tag, and everything else."

"I don't really like sliding head first, never did when I was playing baseball. But sometimes it's necessary. ... You've got to be smart in how you do it."

Not everyone is a pretty slider. Peyton Manning got an earful from his Denver teammates in 2012 when he clomped downfield against Carolina, then executed a hideous slide — think Evel Knievel at Caesars Palace — that excavated a sizeable divot when his left knee brace burrowed into the turf.

"It's not even worth explaining what happened," Manning told reporters at the time. "It looked bad, and the fact that my knee brace got caught, nobody wants to hear that. It is what it is, as they say, and it's right there on film. I'm very aware that it's fair game for criticism and ridicule."

In those hold-your-breath bashes of bodies, it's frequently the quarterback who comes away staggering. There's a reason for that.

"Justin Herbert does no tackling. None," Young said. "And then he's running into people where that's all they do is tackle."

"I used to see smaller guys in the defensive backfield, and I was like, 'OK, I can take that guy on.' But you've got to remember, even those guys, that's all they do is tackle."

When and whether a quarterback should slide often depends on where you're standing, as in, which sideline.

"When it's your own guy, you want him to get down," Farr said. "When Kurt Warner scrambled, I'd be the first one yelling, 'Get down!' And I would tell him, 'Your body doesn't belong to you, it belongs to us.' If he gets tagged, it affects us all."

Young's philosophy: Your most important play is your next one.

"Risks just to show your manhood don't help you get to the next play," he said. "The truth is, if you've still got the ball in your hand, there's been a general failure anyway. Don't compound it by trying to run over somebody to impress someone."

After Herbert's debut, while the Chargers and Chiefs were mingling on the field, Kansas City's Patrick Mahomes offered him some words of advice: "Protect yourself on some of those runs."

Sometimes, staying up requires getting down.

DERWIN JAMES JR.

The comeback story of Chargers' Derwin James: 'I'm coming back to be dominant'

*By Gilbert Manzano
Orange County Register
September 6, 2021*

Derwin James, the freakish athlete for Auburndale High School, was at the free throw line with an opportunity to win a road playoff game against Rockledge.

With the score tied and two seconds left in regulation, the opposing coach called two timeouts to ice the then-freshman forward. James was alone with his thoughts as the crowd rooted against him.

"The spotlight was just on him," recalled Eric Robinson, Auburndale's varsity basketball coach. "I remember shaking my head and feeling bad for the kid because he was put in that position of having to come through as a ninth grader."

James missed both free throws and was forced to prepare for overtime in the first round of the 2012 Florida boys state basketball playoffs.

"I just gave him a hug after he missed and told him we're going to make up for it in overtime and get this win," Robinson said before the Bloodhounds lost 67-63 in overtime.

Nearly 10 years later, Robinson and James haven't spoken about the missed free throws. Initially, it was because there was no need to remind a 15-year-old about his disappointment when the outcome wasn't going to change. But then it quickly became an afterthought.

James had other priorities as the school's star football player with an offer from Florida State. He was also a sprinter and long jumper for the school's track and field team in the spring.

But the cheerful freshman still used his disappointment with his free throw performance as motivation to improve in basketball, a sport he didn't play before high school.

As a freshman, James was already better than most football players in Polk County, but that wasn't good enough for the ultra competitive James, who needs to be great at everything he does.

James returned to the hardwood his sophomore season as a defensive menace who could guard any position. He did the dirty work and was on the receiving end of many alley-oop dunks during Auburndale's memorable 25-4 season.

DEVASTATING SUMMERS

The disappointment of missing two free throws in high school doesn't compare to what the Chargers' star safety has endured the past two seasons.

James, the most beloved and respected player on every team he's been on, had the worst luck on the Chargers for back-to-back summers.

"I was devastated because I had just got hurt on that same field," James said about the knee injury he sustained in last year's training camp, nearly a year after his foot injury in August of 2019.

When James, 25, injured his fifth metatarsal on his right foot while celebrating a play during a joint scrimmage against the New Orleans Saints, there was a sense on the Chargers that they could stay afloat until James returned. He missed the first 11 games of the 2019 season and the Chargers finished 5-11.

When it happened again the following training camp, there was no hope of a James comeback, at least not for that season. The torn meniscus in his right knee sidelined James for the entire 2020 season. The Chargers missed the postseason for a second consecutive year and finished 7-9.

James asked, "Why me?" And the Chargers asked, "Why him?"

Many went to James' house soon after his knee injury to lift his spirits, including former teammates Casey Hayward and Melvin Ingram, former Chargers head coach Anthony Lynn, and David Mulugheta, James' agent.

"Having those guys cheered me up at the moment, but that (expletive) was devastating," James said.

Perhaps James didn't want to discuss the missed free throws as a freshman, but he has no issues revisiting his injuries. It's a part of his comeback story, one he wants to tell with a dominant ending — even better than his memorable rookie season in 2018 when he was named an All-Pro at two positions.

"A lot of times guys get injured and they just want to try to come back and just to be healthy," James said. "No, I'm coming back to be dominant. To be the same person that I was before, and that's the kind of mindset I look at it as."

It's all starting to come together for James in his fourth NFL season. He got through August healthy, just one of many accomplishments on his lengthy checklist for 2021. Next on the list will be playing in Sunday's season opener against the Washington Football Team.

"This year I told myself, 'Everything, I will speak it to existence,'" James said. "I was positive. I'm like, 'We're gonna get healthy, we're gonna make it to the season, we're gonna speak it to existence.' Because everything you say with a tongue is powerful. That's why I believe it."

Leadership and positivity are two of many traits that make James "one of a kind," according to Chargers nose tackle Linval Joseph.

He's the heart and soul of the Chargers, and he's probably their most talented player — even on a roster that features quarterback Justin Herbert, wide receiver Keenan Allen and edge rusher Joey Bosa.

James has been compared to legendary safeties Ed Reed, Brian Dawkins and the late Sean Taylor. Current and former NFL players are clamoring for James' return, and many people in central Florida are itching to watch James on Sundays.

The traits that make Derwin James Jr. special — leadership, competitiveness, versatility, freakish athleticism — were on display in his youth while growing up in Auburndale and Haines City, two cities an hour east of Tampa, Florida.

THE MAKING OF DERWIN JAMES JR.

"Freakish athlete" were the first two words that Robinson uttered when asked about the kid who wore No. 23 on the Auburndale basketball team for the 2011-12 and 2012-13 seasons.

"I couldn't forget him," said Rick Smith, who coached James in football and in track and field at Auburndale.

Without much prior experience, James jumped 20 feet, 11 inches in his first long jump competition as a freshman. He finished the event with a high of 21 feet, 10.75 inches.

"We only had drills at this point, but he could not stand to not actually compete," Smith recalled about James. "So I said, 'OK, I'll let you do one jump and if you look like you know what you're doing, I'll let you do the rest.' ... He nailed everything. I'm like, 'Yeah, you can keep jumping.'"

Before James was a three-sport high school athlete, he played left tackle for his pop Warner team at ages 6. James was needed on the offensive line because there was a lack of size on the roster.

"I had me a couple pancakes," James said about playing left tackle. "My coach used to always get hyped and get crunked. Like that used to make the coaches get excited, especially in pop Warner. Especially if we're skinny guys getting pancake blocks on the line. I got me a couple just being more athletic and physical than guys."

The following football season, James moved to running back and primarily played the position until his freshman season at Auburndale High School. James grew up in Haines City, but his mother, Shanita Russell, moved the family to Auburndale when James was in fifth grade to keep him out of trouble.

James was required to play junior varsity on the Auburndale football team because the coaches wanted the freshmen together to build camaraderie before jumping to varsity. But James didn't want to play on Thursday nights. He knew he belonged on Friday nights, and so did most of the coaches.

James noticed a safety opening on varsity and pushed the head coach to play him there. He eventually listened and offered James a tryout in the form of an old school Oklahoma drill.

The ball was put on the 5-yard line with two defensive tackles and two offensive linemen. James, the brash freshman, lined up at safety and needed to prevent the senior running back with "hella offers" from crossing the goal line.

"I had to meet him at the hole two times," James recalled. "I won those drills and then my coach said, 'That's enough, he's playing varsity.'"

For James' first varsity game, he had two interceptions. He played on defense, offense and special teams.

"Poor guy it seemed like he was playing every down," said Smith, who's now the behavior interventionist at Auburndale.

By James' sophomore year, there was no feeling sorry for him. He was able to handle the workload after putting in countless hours in the weight room.

James went from bench pressing about 135 pounds as a freshman to more than 300 pounds by his sophomore year.

"He was a dog, as we would say," Smith said. "We would get in there and he'd lift those weights. Those weights were clanking around."

James' father, Derwin Sr., is a football legend at Haines City, but Robinson is convinced the younger James got his weight-room competitiveness from his mother.

"I'll tell you, man, I seen her at the gym and my mouth has just dropped, like, the hard work that she puts in at the gym," Robinson said. "I've told her before, 'OK, I see where your son gets it from.' Knowing how good dad was at school and then just seeing her in the gym putting in work at the gym, like there was no way (James) could lose ... he got it from both sides."

James didn't miss a weightlifting session his freshman year, and that included both sessions, one with the upperclassmen and the other with the younger students.

James wanted to push himself by lifting with the older students, but he didn't want to leave behind his fellow freshmen.

"What (James) ended up doing was he would lift with the older guys and any of the younger guys who would come in, he would go and help them and coach them up on how to lift," Smith recalled. "That was my first inclination. 'Hey, man, this guy is a little bit different.'"

Smith quickly noticed James' leadership qualities, but his determination to be better in many areas were just as noticeable. James was getting A grades in all his classes and asked Smith to help get him in the tougher classes.

"I tell my athletes all the time about this," Smith said. "Derwin was the kind of guy that challenged himself. He came to me one time and he asked me about getting into harder classes. ... He's always challenging himself."

Robinson went to every Auburndale football game in the fall of 2011 looking to recruit James to the basketball team.

"Every time (James) turned his shoulder on Friday night, I was right there," said Robinson, who's entering his 20th season at Auburndale. "So I built that relationship with him."

James had Nick Saban at Alabama and coaches at Miami and Clemson trying to get him to decommit from Florida State. But Robinson was also in a recruiting battle for James because the wrestling coach wanted James for the winter season.

"He probably would have been a state champion if he would have wrestled," Robinson said. "I just got lucky enough to get the chance to coach him."

James was torn when he had the opportunity to return to his hometown and transfer to Haines City High School for his junior and senior years. He was loyal to his teammates at Auburndale, but he couldn't pass on the chance to sport the green and white at his family's alma mater.

COMEBACK STORY

James' athletic ability is a reason why he's universally respected in the NFL, but it's also because of his leadership, loyalty and passion.

"I feel like I can relate to him so well because we just have that same love, just love playing football," Chargers linebacker Kenneth Murray said about James. "You could put me on the other side of the world, in like Antarctica, and give me a football and I'll be fine. He has that same attitude."

"He loves the game. He wants to be the best. He's competing to be the best. When you have guys like that on the team, it makes it easier for everyone else around you. I enjoy competing with him and I enjoy being out there with him. Looking forward to dominating this season with him."

No one is doubting James' comeback, especially not after the dominant training camp he had last month. He's still the same Derwin James, the do-it-all defensive stud who always seeks the best.

James challenged Allen, a four-time Pro Bowl wideout, throughout training camp, and called out 49ers All-Pro tight end George Kittle when his team came to Costa Mesa for joint practices.

"He's just kind of a freak of nature," Kittle said after James got in front of him at the goal line to intercept a Jimmy Garoppolo pass and return it for a touchdown to end the joint practice. "He can do whatever you like. He can follow. He can chase you, he can be in your hip, he can play on top, he can try to jam you at the line."

James is back to playing safety, linebacker, cornerback and edge rusher for the Chargers. But the positionless player picked up two more roles for the 2021 season. He'll be calling the plays for the defense and was named a team captain to start the season.

It's strange that the Chargers' top leader has never started a season with a "C" on his jersey. But he quickly won over his teammates during his rookie season and was providing leadership from afar while rehabbing his injuries to start the past two seasons.

Chargers coach Brandon Staley has coached the NFL's best defensive players in the past four years, from the Rams' Aaron Donald and Jalen Ramsey to the Chicago Bears' Khalil Mack to the Denver Broncos' Von Miller and Justin Simmons.

But Staley made a case for why the 6-foot-2, 215-pound James is the most complete player in the NFL.

"There aren't many players like him in the league on any side of the ball," Staley said. "There aren't many players like Derwin James because you have rare talent. Rare talent. Rare size and speed, which are critical factors for the position. He has rare skills for the position. He can do anything on the field and play anywhere. He's your signal-caller. I'm not aware of any other (defensive backs) in the league that are the signal caller."

"You can make the case that he's the leader of our entire football team and the face of your football team — certainly one of them. I haven't been around too many guys like that regardless of the position. Normally, it's quarterbacks. Derwin is one of the few defensive players that I'm aware of in the league that can carry that mantle."

Bosa wants to see James put it all together in 2021 and he's not going to let anyone get in the way. That's why Bosa shoved 49ers wide receiver River Cracraft when he tried to get in James' face during the joint practices.

"Joey don't even act like that," James said about Bosa participating in the camp scuffle. "That's my brother. I treat all them boys as my brothers. Every day is bigger than football for me. You can ask anybody in the locker room. I'm always, 'Man, how's your family?' I want to have a relationship bigger than football. That way when we are in the heat of the battle, I know you got my back."

"See, I know Joey Bosa has my back. Same thing vice versa, man. I have his back."

It makes Bosa happy when he sees pictures of him and James on the field together because it's a glimpse of what they plan to do for the 2021 season.

"I love looking at pictures of us both lining up on the edge together," Bosa said. "It's a scary sight. I always say he's one of the best in the league and I truly believe that at any position, honestly. He's one of the most gifted athletes I've ever seen. And his energy is unbelievable. So just to see him out there happy and healthy, it's great."

It's hard not to be happy for James, just like it was hard not to be disappointed for him when the devastating injuries occurred.

"The kid always had a smile on his face," Robinson said. "He just continues to bounce back. I continue to see that practice clip of him and Keenan Allen going at it. I've seen that clip probably 20 times. And man, I just get chills every time I see it because it just shows the hard work."

James' latest comeback story is almost complete. Auburndale and Haines City will be watching James and Chargers start the season Sunday in Washington.

They want to see James dominate the 2021 season.

"I'm healthy," James said. "Why not?"

Why Derwin James Jr. is NFL's most unique defensive player: 'Mr. Versatility' set to do it all for Los Angeles Chargers' defense

By Jeremy Fowler
ESPN.com
August 26, 2021

COSTA MESA, Calif. -- Derwin James Jr. is a walking espresso, team-chemistry blend.

The Los Angeles Chargers had just finished a two-hour training camp session, and James, freshly stretched, was conducting an animated FaceTime call -- or at least he was trying. He couldn't help himself, engaging every teammate who walked past while he swayed, swung his hair or smirked.

For the Chargers' standout, everyone is a "bro," from offensive linemen to cornerbacks, and they all got shoulder pats from James' yellow-gloved hand or shoutouts as they crossed his vision during the call. Safeties who blitz, play in the post and cover tight ends in the slot were subject to multitasking.

After ending the call, the gifted defensive back greeted a credentialed bro under a tent, made clear his two-year absence is over, those injury labels buried somewhere in L.A. and his league takeover back on.

"I'm not out here half-stepping; I'm not worried about getting injured, bro," James told ESPN. "I'm out here, full speed. That's the only way I know how to play the game."

"It just feels good to be back playing football."

The Chargers don't seem to care that James has missed 27 games over the past two years due to foot surgery in 2019 and a torn meniscus in 2020. The NFL is a cold, calculated business known to discard injury-plagued players, yet the Chargers are building their entire defense around James, adding more cornerback duties to his already loaded plate. His otherworldly talent is the primary reason, with a 6-foot-2, 215-pound frame emblematic of today's positionless football that coaches covet. In a given practice, James will line up as a safety, corner, linebacker or on the edge, all while handling the green dot and calling the defense.

The possibilities seemed endless in 2018, when a healthy James burst onto the scene as a first-round rookie with 105 tackles, 3.5 sacks, 3 interceptions and 13 pass breakups. And anyone watching James move with no limitations this camp has no doubt he can again make a massive impact.

His recent interception and 99-yard return when guarding San Francisco 49ers tight end George Kittle in a joint practice even hyped up LeBron James on social media.

But the Chargers might be even more excited about his leadership. The way the team sees it, he has basically been a team captain since the Chargers drafted him 17th overall three-plus years ago.

"He just has a glow," first-year head coach Brandon Staley said. "People are really drawn to him, a spirit and energy that brings people to him, brings people with him."

Some teams might be inclined to place a protective bubble around James, but the Chargers have let James be himself. There are no limitations here, largely because his injuries didn't linger.

As James described, his 2019 injury was "getting a new screw in my foot after the old one bent on me" in his fifth metatarsal. The original screw was from a surgery prior to joining the NFL. The procedure cost him 11 games that season. And then the 2020 meniscus tear was a routine four-to five-month injury, but it just happened at the worst time: late in an Aug. 30 scrimmage.

"All of it was simple fixes," James said. "They fixed it, and I feel stronger."

This helps explain why the Chargers picked up James' fifth-year option of $9.052 million for 2022 despite all the time missed. That says a lot about how they value him. And with other first-round picks from his class -- including quarterback Josh Allen, offensive tackle Kolton Miller and center Frank Ragnow -- already getting extensions, James is poised for a major payout if he has a big season and stays on the field.

And James spent all offseason confirming his good health, leaning heavily on a player who has been there.

Before Keenan Allen became a perennial Pro Bowl receiver for the Chargers, he fought the injury-prone label as he recovered from an early-career torn ACL. So, Allen adopted a rigorous offseason routine -- a blend of band work, mobility and balance training and running on a track that he calls "prehab" -- to engender longevity.

James asked Allen to teach him the workouts. Throughout the offseason, Allen would text James at around 10 most nights to plan a meetup at a local track near the Chargers' facility early the next morning.

"Bet," James always responded.

"We're both the same dogs -- same animal, different beasts," Allen said. "We both have that dog, get it by any means."

Allen called their training together "special" and "personal." And his advice to James was clear-cut: Know what you bring to the table, control what you can and stay in the lab.

In fact, Allen has urged James to guard him in one-on-ones all camp long because, according to Allen, "He's the best cover guy we have right now" and has the best technique, which James showed off with a deep-ball interception against Allen in the second week of camp.

James was not lacking for confidence, but he emerged from those sessions with Allen ready to address any questions about his durability.

"When I'm back to making plays on the field, those [critics] will be the same people rooting for me again," James said about those who question his long-term viability due to injury.

"I don't really get too caught up in, 'Hey, he's too injury-prone.' I'm ready to go back out there and show the world what I can do, showing he's a guy that bounced back from adversity and took it and ran with it. That was the hand I was dealt, but it's not who I am."

The time away from the game also has challenged James to refine his leadership and mental capacity for football.

He said he can walk into any position room in the Chargers' facility to fire off friendly banter, asking offensive linemen if they are ready for his blitzing or notifying receivers it's "no slants day" on the practice field. He gets away with this because he invests in teammates first.

"A lot of players are going through a lot, and guys don't often take the time to get to know players," James said. "I can go in any room -- quarterback room, O-line room, whatever -- and start off with a smile, bringing that energy every day, speaking to them. How is your family doing? How are your kids doing? All the little stuff that some people tend to forget in this game."

James also has expanded his knowledge of formations and offensive tendencies, consistently giving quarterback Justin Herbert different post-snap looks in practice. James takes copious notes on every position in defensive meetings to understand all the moving parts. And in practice, his directives to teammates at the line of scrimmage are urgent but unstartling: "Line up ... we good, we good ... I'm here."

Staley coached cornerback Jalen Ramsey, James' good friend from their Florida State days, as the Los Angeles Rams' defensive coordinator last year. And here's the ultimate compliment: James is one of the few NFL players Ramsey views as his peer, Staley said. That's how immense the talent is. So why wouldn't Staley use James as an all-over-the-field weapon?

"He can play anywhere in the deep part of the field, he can play in the half, he can play in the post, he can play in the quarter, he can play in the slot man-to-man, whether inside in the slot, he can play star -- which is our nickel -- he can play money, and he can rush the passer," Staley said. "And he's our signal caller. When you talk versatility to me, he's Mr. Versatility."

And that's what James wants, he said. Yes, he is a box safety. He's just nine other things too.

Teams have prioritized positional flexibility for years, with the Kansas City Chiefs' Tyrann Mathieu and Washington's Landon Collins being other examples at safety. Safeties who can make linebacker-type splash plays at the line of scrimmage add value to their teams.

And at linebacker, the Cleveland Browns and Pittsburgh Steelers recently drafted Jeremiah Owusu-Koramoah and Devin Bush, respectively, because of the advantage their open-field speed provides. But James might be the most valuable of all because he can cover like a true cornerback at 6-foot-2.

The Chargers are expecting James to put an already decent defense over the top. They were middle of the pack on that side of the ball in 2020 despite another slew of injuries, finishing 16th both in the Football Power Index's defensive rating and yards allowed per play (5.5).

"We know we can be special, but we say that every year, so let's just not say it" has become sort of a running joke with Allen and other Chargers.

It's hard not to say it this year, though. Herbert is considered a top-10 quarterback leaguewide after just one season, and the talent at the offensive skill positions is top-shelf. With $135 million man Joey Bosa off the edge and a good mix of complementary veterans and young talent, Staley should be able to maximize the play of the defense with his scheme.

James wholly believes the Chargers will make a deep playoff push.

"We've got the guys," he said.

And he has no plans to be sidelined for it.

"It feels amazing to be myself again," James said. "I feel like guys gravitate toward me, and being that leader that they need me to be, knowing they drafted me in the first round for a reason, is a blessing."

Chargers' bolt is BACK: 'Alpha leader' Derwin James drives culture of accountability in Los Angeles

COSTA MESA, Calif. -- Chris Harris Jr. has been around long enough to understand the importance of conserving energy as training camp nears its close. So at the end of a practice last week, with one day remaining before the end of camp, the Los Angeles Chargers' 11th-year cornerback took the longer route to greet a visitor, walking along the waist-high chain-link fence until he found an opening that allowed him to reach the other side.

He took a seat on a white folding chair, removed his mouthpiece and exhaled. The light at the end of camp's long dark tunnel was bright and welcomed. But the smile on his face moments later had nothing to do with that. It had everything to do with teammate Derwin James, who walked to the fence, placed both hands on top of it and easily hopped to the other side.

The moment was a testament to not only James' youth and athleticism -- now 25, he is seven years younger than Harris -- but also a metaphor for the standout safety's approach to the season. He isn't interested in circuitous routes. He's all about direct lines, whether seeking out a ball-carrier or attacking questions about his health. He understands why people keep bringing up his physical well-being after missing 27 of 32 games the past two seasons because of foot and knee injuries, respectively, but the questions have grown stale.

Rather than attempt to sidestep them, he runs through them, just as he would an opponent. He drives home his point with an unmistakable intensity, his normally infectious smile vanishing and his eyes wide and unblinking.

"I hate when people say, 'If y'all stay healthy ... ,' " he pronounced, speaking of both himself and the team in general. "I'm tired of that. I'm going to stay healthy and we're going to stay healthy. We're speaking that into the air."

If so, the Chargers could be the sleeper team of 2021. They have the 2020 Offensive Rookie of the Year in quarterback Justin Herbert, an offensive line that was upgraded with the signing of the top available center (Corey Linsley) in free agency and one of the top tackles (Rashawn Slater) in the draft, plus a deep stable of pass catchers and a defense that features impactful edge rusher Joey Bosa and athletic inside linebacker Kenneth Murray. And then there is James. His return after missing all of last season because of knee surgery is the tide that can lift almost any team.

The 6-foot-2, 215-pounder transcends labels. In some situations, he's a defensive back. In others, he's a linebacker. Then he's a pass rusher. Then a returner. There really isn't anything he can't do, which is why he was voted first-team All-Pro as a rookie. Veterans like Harris normally temper expectations or comparisons with players still seeking to establish roots in the league, but not when it comes to James.

"I've played with a lot of great people in the secondary -- Hall of Famers like Champ (Bailey) and Dawk (Brian Dawkins) -- but it's hard to say anybody is like this kid, the way he loves the game, the way he competes every day," Harris said. "He's very smart and has a great enthusiasm about him, a great spirit about him. And he has freakish talent. He can run, has great quickness, very physical and strong. The season could definitely change with him out there. He's that special of a player."

James was among the first in line when the football gods were handing out athletic intellect and ability. But what takes his stature with teammates to a higher level is his unbridled passion for the game. Some people love the game for what it can do for them; others cherish it for the competition and camaraderie. James is the latter, which has earned him the respect and the right among teammates to push and pull them.

During a recent 11-on-11 drill, the defense was short a corner. Rather than let it pass, James immediately called out the culprit, whose name has been withheld by protective team members. It might have been a simple lapse to some, but to James, it was much more than that. He's trying to establish a culture of accountability on a team where there were issues getting the right people on the field during multiple games last season.

"Do you want to be out here?!" James demanded.

Two days later, when asked about his reaction, James didn't back down.

"I challenged him because there's no reason we should ever have 10 guys on defense," he said. "If anything, we should have 12 guys out there. The coach should have to pull you off the field, not hold things up to get you on the field. That's telling me that you don't want to be there. It's all about mindset when you take the field, and having the right approach. Having 10 guys, I don't like that."

His commitment and dedication is a reason he wears the captain's "C" on his jersey, and why he has the respect of those around him. The next malicious bone you find in his body will be the first. He is unfailingly positive and enthusiastic, with an intuitive sense of how to get through to people.

"He holds guys accountable, but he does it in the right way," general manager Tom Telesco said. "He knows when to push on guys, and he knows when to pat them on the back. He has a great feel and we missed that last season. He's that alpha leader that everyone follows."

James was regarded as one of the more gifted players in the 2018 draft, but inexplicably fell to the Chargers at No. 17 because of concerns about a knee injury sustained during his Florida State career. It didn't take long for James to make clubs regret passing on him, as he started every game for the Chargers as a rookie.

He opened the season at free safety, but the coaches soon realized his athleticism and intellect could make him a force on every level. So defensive coordinator Gus Bradley switched him to strong safety to allow James to play closer to the line of scrimmage, where he could rush the passer, neutralize tight ends and, sometimes, defend receivers in the slot.

He finished the year with 105 tackles, three interceptions, 13 passes defended, six quarterback hits and 3.5 sacks, a stat-stuffing effort that immediately proved his standing as one of the most dynamic defensive chess pieces in the league. More importantly, his presence helped the Chargers reach the playoffs for the first time in five years.

"He elevates everyone around him: defense, offense, special teams. Shoot, he even elevates coaches," Bradley, now defensive coordinator of the rival Las Vegas Raiders, said recently. "You see the way he competes and the way he goes out and plays the game, and his love for the game, and it forces you to match it. If you don't, you have to ask yourself: Who's the leader here? Who's the one who's taking charge and setting the tone? It's just unique, the impact he has."

He's particularly impactful when using disrespect as a motivational tool, such as last week on the final day of joint workouts with the San Francisco 49ers. Niners wideout River Cracraft was looking to catch the eyes of the coaches and ultimately land a spot on the team's receiver-rich roster, and one way to draw attention was by showing he would not back down from anyone. Enter James.

Cracraft stuck on his block of James a little too long during an 11-on-11 drill near the goal line, nearly setting off a scrap between the sides. Two snaps later, the two had words again. Word to the wise: You might get away with poking the bear once, but not twice. On the next snap, James undercut tight end George Kittle and picked off a pass that he returned 99 yards for a touchdown, raising his right index finger as he crossed midfield.

A point needed to be made, and James made it. It didn't matter that Kittle had gotten him for a TD earlier in a similar situation. All that mattered is that he felt tested by Cracraft, by Kittle and by quarterback Jimmy Garoppolo.

"I love it. I love odds against me. I love it all. It's just how I was raised," James said in general, not specifically about the interception return. "You're going to see what type of person you are when there's pressure. Me, I'm going to come with it."

He doesn't care what's before him -- an All-Pro tight end, a former Super Bowl-starting QB, a young receiver trying to make the team, or a chain-link fence. He knows what he wants and is committed to take a direct line to get there.

"There ain't no ceiling for me," James said. "I'm going to continue to get better. I don't put a cap on me because I'm always trying to find a way to get better. I feel like I can do so many things better, so I don't try to put it like: OK, you need five interceptions, you need 100 tackles, you need to go to the Pro Bowl. I just want to be available for my teammates and come out and get better every day. Everything else will take care of itself."

TYRON JOHNSON

Chargers WR Tyron Johnson continues to build off 'life-changing' play

COSTA MESA — Chargers wide receiver Tyron Johnson described his 53-yard touchdown last season against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers as a life-changing play because that's when he made a name for himself in the NFL.

"Most definitely it was life changing because I was on the practice squad before and nobody knew what I could do," Johnson said Monday. "When I did that, the world knew what I could do."

The NFL learned of Tyron Johnson when he pounded his chest in the end zone after catching Justin Herbert's touchdown pass on the first drive of the Week 4 matchup in Tampa Bay.

But around the New Orleans area, they already knew what the Chargers wideout could do. They just knew him under the name of Tyron Billy or "T-Billy."

Johnson introduced himself to Chargers teammates as "T-Billy" last summer when he was fighting for a roster spot. Some teammates weren't sure why Johnson called himself that, but it was catchy and easy to say at news conferences when reporters asked about the many plays No. 83 was making in training camp.

But Johnson's dynamic plays weren't enough to make last year's initial 53-man roster because many of those plays were with the second-team offense with a rookie Herbert throwing him the ball.

It didn't take long for Johnson to join the active roster from the practice squad. He quickly established himself as one of Herbert's top deep threats. Herbert started the 2020 season as Tyrod Taylor's backup before becoming the starter in Week 2.

"It wasn't tough," Johnson said about not making the 53-man roster last summer. "It was another adversity. It wasn't nothing that I was down about. It just made me go harder at practice. ... When I didn't make the 53 last year, I just came back even harder and it was hard to deny me."

It's fitting that Johnson's first career NFL touchdown went for 53 yards because that was the number he chased for his first two seasons in the NFL as an undrafted free agent from Oklahoma State. Johnson was waived by the Buffalo Bills, Carolina Panthers and twice by the Houston Texans during his rookie season in 2019.

Being selected as one of the Chargers' top 53 players likely won't be an issue for Johnson this summer because he picked up where he left off last season. He started training camp by connecting with Herbert often downfield.

"That's just communication," Johnson said about his chemistry with Herbert. "We came in to the Chargers together. We were on the twos (second team) together. ... We developed a chemistry when nobody was watching, not on TV, not on preseason, but at practice. So when game time came it was just natural."

"He got the arm to do it and I got the speed to do it, so it's like peanut butter and jelly — the perfect connection."

Johnson has found a home with the Chargers, but it was still a mystery as to why he's called "T-Billy." Johnson said Billy is the last name of his mother and he went by Tyron Billy until his junior year in high school.

His father's last name is Johnson and he decided to change it to that name before college. Tyron Billy Johnson said he plans on merging both last names to honor the two sides of his family.

"Nobody calls me Johnson and T.J.," Johnson said. "I was never in a rush to really change it because nobody ever called me Johnson or T.J. It was always Billy even after the name change."

The wideout known as "T-Billy" is sticking around with the Chargers, but he hasn't gotten complacent this summer. He wasn't at ease when he missed a week of training camp practice because of a foot and ankle injury.

"I'm never at ease with sitting out and not playing," Johnson said. "I just love the game and I'm just competitive, but I did enough in the regular season last year to be comfortable and to know I should have a spot on this team, if not this team another team in the league."

Johnson is known as a deep threat, but he wants to be an all-around wide receiver. He said he's capable of doing more, but focused on being a vertical threat last season because that's the role the Chargers needed last season.

"If they needed an underneath guy, that's what I would have been," Johnson said. "I just fit into what they needed and it was speed and it gave me an opportunity and it was a perfect match."

Tyron Johnson: Proving the Doubters Wrong

We're continuing our series of checking in with Chargers players ahead of the 2021 season.

Our next conversation features wide receiver Tyron Johnson.

More commonly known as T Billy, Johnson looks to build off his impressive 2020 campaign where he led all pass catchers with four receptions of 50-plus yards.

Here's more from Johnson on his underdog mentality, Justin Herbert, and oh yeah, where the nickname T Billy comes from.

Welcome back! You were having such a stellar camp and then you got a little banged up. What was the process like of having to wait it out and take a little time to get back?

Tyron Johnson: I'm feeling good! It's good. It wasn't a rush, really. It's still early. We didn't want to jump out too quickly so the best thing I had on my side was time. I had time to sit out and miss, but it feels good to be back out here.

How's camp been going since coming back?

Johnson: It's been great. Just working every day, getting up and trying to make something happen.

What's it been like being back out here in front of fans who were missing last year?

Johnson: It's energizing for sure. Instead of last year coming out here flat with nobody and not hearing anything is really demoralizing. But having fans is that extra boost and extra energy that we need to win games.

You've been putting on a show out here for them!

Johnson: I feel like that's my obligation! When I wake up I think I'm gonna make a play today. I'm gonna make something special happen. I try to wake up every day with that mindset of doing something nobody else does.

What was the biggest difference for you last year in terms of being available, but making plays?

Johnson: Last year, I felt like I was hungry. I was fighting for my life to make this team I felt like. So now it's, 'We know you can make plays, what else can you do?' That's where I'm at right now. Taking another jump from last year. I did this, what can I do better?

How did the time that you spent with Justin Herbert last year in camp help you?

Johnson: It helped both of us. Tyrod [Taylor] was the starter, so the reps I got were with Herbert. We had the connection way before he got the No. 1 job and way before I got activated. So when he threw the ball to me, it was something that had been going on but nobody saw because we were the 2s. We built chemistry and by the time I got in the game, it was just money.

What's the most impressive thing about Herbert?

Johnson: Seeing how far he came from where he started. Seeing him coming in, then seeing him get called into a game where he really wasn't supposed to play and go out there and play like he did? I was amazed after that! I knew what he could do from in practice, I was just waiting for that moment. When he got in and he did what he did? I was like, that guy can play!

What's the key to getting separation downfield?

Johnson: Closing the cushion between you and the defender. Once you pass him, put your head down and get into another gear so he can't catch up. But also, just having a guy who can sling it that far! That helps. A guy that can get me the ball 60- or 70-yards down field, that's a fast guy's dream, a quarterback that can get it there.

What excites you most about the preseason?

Johnson: Just getting to play against someone else. You get OTAs and then you get to camp, and you're going against your guys every day. When it's time to go against somebody else, it's a whole different feeling and it brings out a whole different type of player in everybody.

What's a fun fact about you?

Johnson: A lot of people don't know this, I scored on my first touch at every level of my career. At two different colleges, too. I didn't know this, but my friends called me and told me I did it. That's gotta be like my favorite personal record.

Who was your favorite player growing up?

Johnson: A tough one! I liked a lot of players growing up. I'm gonna start with Randy Moss, TO [Terrell Owens], Marvin Harrison, Reggie Wayne. That group of guys made me wanna be a dog receiver. Steve Smith. It's never one set guy, I just liked a lot of people's games.

You think you take a little from those guys?

Johnson: I try to take a little but I'm me. I'm T Billy. But from the greats, I add a little piece to my game.

Where does T Billy come from?

Johnson: That's me! It's what people called me when I was young. My last name was Billy before it was Johnson, so I had two first names in 'Tyron Billy' and my elementary school teachers just called me Billy. All my life, people never called me Tyron or TJ, when I [added] Johnson. But since elementary, I've been called Billy and then in high school it was T Billy from there.

Is that more comfortable for you?

T Billy: You're gonna naturally adapt to it. If you've been around me or people I've been around, you're naturally gonna call me T Billy before you even know my real name.

What was your favorite play last season?

T Billy: It had to be against Atlanta. I had the deep out route, cover two to set up the game winning field goal. Badge [Michael Badgley] lined up to kick it. I got the game ball, offensive player of the game. That was just one of my favorite plays just to do something other than a deep route and show I can do other stuff. On top of it, it was big. Being undrafted to having to check in the game and help win it for the team.

Lastly, knowing where you came from, being undrafted, do you still have that hunger in camp this year?

T Billy: It's the same hunger [as] being undrafted. I wake up and say every team passed on me seven times. They're crazy! When I walk out here, I'm proving everyone wrong, all the doubters wrong. I believe in myself always. It's a great feeling to be out here. I'm grateful for the opportunity.

JUSTIN JONES

A Conversation With: Justin Jones

By Hayley Elwood

July 6, 2021

This summer, we thought we'd check in with a few Chargers players before the 2021 season kicks into gear.

Our second conversation features defensive tackle Justin Jones.

2021 marks Jones' fourth season in the league and with experience under his belt, he's ready for what this year will bring.

Here's more from Jones on the benefits to the new defensive scheme, how he's fitting into it, what it's like being a first-time dad, and more.

2021 is your fourth season in the league, how crazy is it that it's already year four for you?

Justin Jones: It's gone by pretty fast, I'm not gonna lie. But, I'm definitely looking forward to this season. We've got a lot in store, especially for our defense and especially for our defensive front. The things we're doing this year are so crazy compared to what we've been doing previous seasons.

Yeah look, I'm not gonna ask you to give away any secrets! But what feels different?

Jones: We've got a lot more space now which frees a lot of us up. That's going to give us opportunities to get these one-on-ones and expose them. That'll be really good for us as a front because we've got some really good rushers on our team and now, we really get to showcase their abilities with the space.

How good does it feel to physically get out on the field with the new coaching staff in the offseason program?

Jones: At first, I was pretty anxious because I wanted to see how everything was going to look. But after being out here, listening to the coaches and what they're trying to accomplish, I'm really confident in the season. Like really, really confident. That's a good thing because normally going into a season, I'm not saying I wasn't confident, but you might still have your doubts on how we're gonna do certain things. But here, where we're at right now, it's more just this is how we're going to run it. When (the other team) does this, we're going to adjust to it like this. It's a legit game plan that's flexible enough to work against all teams.

It really feels like the tone is being set right now.

Jones: Facts. You can definitely feel it throughout the building.

How does your role this year compare to what you've done in the past?

Jones: This year, I feel like I'm gonna get a lot more one-on-ones and that's gonna let me really showcase my abilities and talents. In previous years, we've had really good rushers, and me being the young player, you had to allow those rushers to keep doing their things so we can win these games. So that kind of pushed me in a box, lowkey. So ability-wise, just really showing what I'm able to do, and now I'll be able to put that in front and show everybody what's going on.

This offseason, you've posted a lot of videos on your Instagram account of you working out. How has your training regimen changed or evolved since you came into the league?

Jones: We focus more so on function of movements and being explosive out of the actual football movements rather than your regular traditional lifts and traditional conditioning. We went more so with functionality and it's really gonna help my game and be really beneficial for me just being strong out of certain movements. Where I was training at, it was a new gym. The guy who was training me, I actually went to high school with him, but he went to school for this. So the gym was fairly new but we got to it and I had a really good offseason with him.

A couple years ago, you mentioned changing your diet, you picked up boxing. Is there anything new, besides some of your training, that you've implemented or are doing differently this year?

Jones: I went home! I went home for the first time in a long time. I hadn't been home for more than a week in years, so this was the first time I stayed home for about three months for the most part. It brought me back to humble beginnings.

Your daughter recently turned six months old, what's being a dad like?

Jones: It's the greatest thing in the world, just watching her grow up. Seeing her try to walk, right now as we're on the phone she's in here walking around in her walker just touching stuff and trying to figure out where everything is. From her being first born to now, it's just crazy. She's grown so much. She's so interested in everything around her. She wants to talk. She wants to eat everything. She wants to be involved in everything. I see myself in her so much and it's beautiful.

What did it mean to get to spend that time with her in a really important part of her life?

Jones: It was beautiful. She came at the perfect time. Honestly, she was just what I needed. I'm glad she's here. She's healthy and she got to see her grandma and get to see other people in her family and that's beautiful, too.

What do you mean by saying "she was just what I needed?" Is it how some guys say they have a bigger purpose when kids become a part of their life?

Jones: That's exactly what it is and you never know how real it is until it's actually in front of you. She looks just like you and acts just like you and wants to be just like you or just like her mom. It's beautiful.

Lastly Justin, what are some things that you want to accomplish this year whether it's personal goals or with this team?

Jones: I just wanna win. I really enjoy winning, I love the ins and outs of the game, and I love performing with my teammates just seeing everybody make plays and me making plays myself is a really fun thing. So just being able to do that, especially in this new scheme which enables everybody to be who they are as players, it's just gonna be really cool and really scary for a lot of teams.

JOSHUA KELLEY

A Conversation With: Joshua Kelley

This summer, we thought we'd check in with a few Chargers players before the 2021 season kicks into gear.

Our third conversation features running back Joshua Kelley.

After an unprecedented rookie season filled with personal highs and lows, Kelley is entering year two with a new wisdom and is excited for what's to come.

Here's more from Kelley on his expectations for his second season, the challenges he overcame in year one, what he learned from Justin Herbert, and more.

How has the offseason program gone for you?

Joshua Kelley: It's been really good. It's been really a treat, to be honest, actually having OTAs and being able to go in (to the facility) and learn a whole new system. I'm taking every day as a gift. Football is awesome, and I get to play it every single day. I'm not taking it for granted. This offseason has been good, but I'm ready and excited to get back to the season. It's been too long.

I believe that. You mentioned it, this is your first real offseason, because last year you guys dealt with the impact of COVID protocols, but you're also learning something new – again. How beneficial is it to physically be on that field instead of last year with it being virtual?

Kelley: It makes a huge difference. It really does. Having to actually run the plays, walk through the plays, see your coaches, talk to them. Being able to go through things on the field with your teammates to get a good feel for what everyone's doing around you. It makes a huge difference. It's an advantage. Not having that last season was definitely a disadvantage for all the rookies who came in. But it is what it is and you can't really pout about it anymore. So just having the chance to do it this year makes a difference and slows the game down more.

Now that you've lived it for a year, just how much faster is the NFL than college?

Kelley: It's definitely faster. It's moving parts that you have to understand like on special teams and offense. I think what helped me was as the season progressed and I was studying and watching tape, it slows down. And definitely going into this year, I'm starting to see things slow down. Obviously, we're walking through plays, but just my mental process and knowing what I'm doing or what my assignment is, everything is slowing down.

How do you pair that mental aspect and the physical aspect together? I know you're walking through things right now, but how do you take the mental aspect of what you learned last year and apply it to these walk throughs?

Kelley: I think the most important thing about the mental game is understanding how to be a pro. Understanding you can come in, you can clock in, but that's only half the battle. I think the real thing mentally is watching tape, asking questions, taking time to really dissect not just what you're doing, but the whole concept. I think that's a big part of understanding the whole game. What's the concept of this play? What's the concept of this return unit I'm on? Just understanding the holistic approach to everything makes your job easier because I know what everyone else around me is doing. I think as a rookie, I was just caught up in knowing what I was doing. I was just concerned about my assignment. It makes a big difference when you have that approach because then physically, you can just play faster.

When it comes to the rookie class from last year, it's kind of a special group because you guys experienced uncharted territory. No one had been through an offseason or an NFL season like that. Have you talked with some of your draft classmates at just how much better this year feels?

Kelley: What's funny is we talk about that a lot! Looking back on it, in hindsight, you'd love to have this opportunity, but I'm grateful for it. If we handled whatever was thrown at us last year, I think we can pretty much handle whatever is thrown at us these next couple years. But, in terms of reaching out to these rookies, I've gotten a chance to know them a lot recently. Especially Larry (Rountree) since he's in our room. I chat with him every single day. He's a great guy and we've been getting able to know each other. Obviously, he's a professional now, but I've been giving him some keys and tools and things that I've learned that have helped me. He's been soaking it up like a sponge and isn't afraid to ask, which is a really good trait.

What did you learn about yourself last season?

Kelley: I learned I can play in the NFL. I knew that, because I had confidence in myself, but I think I learned it about myself. Now it's a matter of playing faster and understanding, other people on the other side are pros, too. Nothing is going to come easy. But I think that was the biggest thing for me because all the stuff I went through, I was like okay, I've had success, I know I can play here, it's just all about knowing mentally, it's about bringing that same energy every single game that I belong here, and I can take that approach into this year.

You're always such a positive person, but when you talk about the mental approach, was it something you had to discover as the highs and lows of the season happened?

Kelley: For me, the highs were the easiest. Like you said, I'm positive, I always see the good things so going through high school and college, I always believed in myself, but I never understood how important that was until I got here. I really never had that until I got to the NFL where I realized I had to flip a switch mentally and believe in myself. You can be humble but you also need to have that confidence in yourself to play in this league and survive. That's something I've learned. Some guys have it, I've learned it.

When it comes to Justin Herbert, obviously a draft classmate of yours, what was it like being on the field with him and watching him grow as the season went on to end in an Offensive Rookie of the Year campaign?

Kelley: I learned a lot from him. What's crazy is we all came in at the same time and despite everything we went through, he had so much success his first year. He was just ballin'! I learned a lot from him because right off the bat, he knew he could play in this league. I had to learn that mental approach he had, but it rubbed off on me going into this year. I learned a lot from a guy who's a tremendous leader, picks guys up. He's just awesome. He's an awesome person and I'm really happy that we have him on our team!

What about running backs coach Derrick Foster and this new coaching staff?

Kelley: I love coach Foster. I just had this connection with him right away. I could just tell he has so much passion for the game of football. That's what I love as a coach; guys who love the game but can talk to you on a personal level. Ask you, 'How's your family? Do you want to watch some extra tape?' He's cool! It's a cool relationship. At the end of the day, we see him as a mentor and a friend.

It sounds like having that personal connection or him even taking a personal interest in you, it goes further, right?

Kelley: It definitely does. He told me his story, I had to do some research on him and how he got to Iowa and where he's at the Chargers right now. He's big-time! I learned a lot from him – just his perseverance – that's just a big contribution to our room!

What really excites you about this season?

Kelley: There are a lot of things that excite me about this season. I know we're gonna come out strong, I just really want to see our potential flourish, that's what I'm most excited about. This team has a lot of potential. In this locker room every day, I see the guys we have and the coaching staff we have, the potential is through the roof. I think we can make it happen. I think if our potential really does maximize, we can do some damage. I can say that, but we have to show it.

And what about showing that potential in front of fans for the first time in Los Angeles?

Kelley: That's exactly it! I'm so juiced about that. I've been watching the NBA playoffs with fans in the arena and I'm like dang, SoFi is gonna be crazy! Having fans in the stadium, there's nothing like that. We all feed off that energy, that buzz. Seeing people there, seeing your family in the stands and being like, ok, I really have to ball out now!

What are some of your goals for 2021?

Kelley: I definitely have a lot of goals on my mind. For me, my first goal is I want to do whatever it takes for this team to reach the next level. I know I have to have a huge role on special teams, offense, everything. But I wanna have a huge impact on this team. I want to rush for 1,000 yards, however that can be. I have a lot of high expectations for myself but I think I can reach them if I keep working and keep trusting the process.

COREY LINSLEY

Chargers' Corey Linsley protects, on and off the field

By Mark Whicker
Los Angeles Daily News
March 22, 2021

In April 2014, Corey Linsley came in 160th in the NFL's annual beauty contest.

Five months later, he was snapping the ball to Aaron Rodgers on the first play of the NFL season.

Talk about survive and advance.

J.C. Tretter, the starting center, was hurt two weeks earlier. Linsley's moment came at him like a locomotive through a tunnel. It did not help that the opponent was Seattle, in Seattle, where quarterbacks and eardrums are pressured equally. The Seahawks were reigning Super Bowl champs, and this was Thursday Night Football.

"It was a hell of a deal," Linsley said Friday, his first official day as a Charger. "On Saturday, I could feel my heart racing. I thought, 'I don't know if I can do this.' Doubt creeps into your mind."

It wasn't just a matter of delivering a football into Rodgers' prying hands. It was recognizing defensive fronts that were designed, by Pete Carroll, to be unrecognizable. It was deciding to slide the protections and, beyond that, making himself heard to four beleaguered mates.

And, yeah, it was blocking. Linsley lasted until the fifth round because, as centers go, he was on the frail side at 6-foot-3 and 296 pounds.

Careers have been vaporized by less.

But then Rodgers got up the day before the game and talked about the "I belong" moment.

"He said that when you get on the field, you're good enough to play in the NFL," Linsley recalled. "That helped me out a lot."

Linsley did belong. On his first play, Eddie Lacy gained six yards. On the third play, Lacy got 15 up the middle.

The Packers punted and then punted again, but recovered a fumble. Six plays later, John Kuhn scored. Seattle eventually won 36-16, but Linsley started all 16 games and started 99 in seven years. He has since refined that job to grunt-and-lift art.

In 2020, Linsley was rated the NFL's top center by Pro Football Focus and was named first-team All-Pro. The Packers chose to pay other people, so Linsley, one year after the Chargers signed Packers tackle, became the latest care package for a Chargers' offensive line that seems resistant to improvement. With quarterback Justin Herbert as the kid prince, you never have enough bodyguards.

"I don't let things get too complicated," Linsley said. "Obviously the weather here is a cool factor. But it's a job, and now it's up to me to hold up my end of the contract. I don't need to tell Justin much. I remember every spectacular throw Aaron made, but his work and his intelligence for the game are why he's the quarterback he is."

Few NFL fans get stressed about the comings and goings of the big men. From the seats, they appear interchangeable.

Linsley's move hits Green Bay harder, because the city saw the man outside the helmet. He was the Packers' Walter Payton Award nominee, primarily for the work he and his wife Anna did on the part of Court Appointed Special Services.

Those who volunteer for CASA represent neglected and abused children. They go to court on their behalf, they meet with their kids once a week. In some cases, they're de facto parents.

"We had one child whom Corey and Anna had worked with for more than a year," said Kristin Jacobs, the executive director of the Brown County (Wis.) CASA chapter. "He had no idea that Corey was a football player. Then he was watching a game that went to overtime, and Corey was at midfield for the coin toss with his helmet off. He said, 'Look, that's my CASA.'"

While Linsley was getting squared away in Costa Mesa, Anna was checking out local CASA opportunities.

"We're the voice for the children," Linsley said. "They can't testify for themselves in court. I had a pretty comfortable upbringing (in Youngstown, Ohio). I didn't know what a social worker was. A situation like this affects children from all demographics, from all economic groups. Kristin had a connection to us because she's from Youngstown originally. The more we learned, the more we were drawn to this. The fact that not everybody gets that, that not everybody knows what's going on, is tragic."

"It was a tough day for a lot of us when Corey and Anna left," Jacobs said. "They approached this like any other volunteer. They took the 30 hours of training like everybody else."

Andy Herman, who works for Packers.com, commemorated Linsley's career by asking fans for $63 donations to CASA, since Linsley wore 63. In fewer than 12 hours they had delivered $5,000.

The Chargers will do well to prove they belong on Corey Linsley's team. Some centers find a way to be central.

Corey Linsley is front and center of Chargers' offensive line rebuild

By Jeff Miller
Los Angeles Times
March 20, 2021

Everything about the Chargers these days centers on Justin Herbert. Including the new center.

The team just signed Corey Linsley, a reigning All-Pro, to the richest contract in NFL history at the position.

At the core of that steep investment is the goal of giving Herbert and the Chargers every chance to succeed in the quarterback's second season.

Linsley spent the last seven seasons with Green Bay and played in at least 13 games six of those years while the team went 71-40-1 and made three conference title games.

He brings all that positive experience and something else just as valuable to an offensive line that plays a critical role in Herbert's development.

"When we get up to the line of scrimmage, my job, my most important job, is to get everybody on the same page ... being able to communicate with everybody on the O-line and the quarterback as well," Linsley said. "Communication is key."

"I can reach guys in pass block or whatever, but it doesn't mean anything if everybody isn't on the same page and we're all going different directions. That's the biggest thing on my plate that I've got to take care of."

Last season, Herbert played well enough to be chosen as the NFL's best offensive rookie and did so behind a line so poor that general manager Tom Telesco is now working to change 80% of it.

If a rebuilt front anchored by Linsley can give Herbert more time and help, who knows how high Herbert's ceiling might extend? Aiding him at the line of scrimmage pre-snap is the first step in protecting him.

Linsley, who turns 30 in July, said Packers quarterback Aaron Rodgers helped him understand the importance of identifying defenses quickly and communicating the proper calls.

"That's something that I've taken pride in," he said. "I felt like we had a really good thing going in Green Bay that we kind of built. It takes everybody."

Linsley was a fifth-round draft pick out of Ohio State in 2014 but emerged rapidly, starting in his NFL debut and never relinquishing the job. So he knows about learning under fire, something Herbert perfected in 2020.

Easing Linsley's transition to a new offense is the fact his old offense was quite similar. In discussions with Chargers right tackle Bryan Bulaga, another former Packer, Linsley said his understanding is matters won't be vastly different for him.

"It seems like they're coaching the same stuff," he said. "You know, coming off the ball, an emphasis on the run game, playing physical and tough. That's all the stuff that we talked about in Green Bay. ... That definitely drew me to here."

So did Bulaga, Linsley explaining that he was sold on the Chargers by Bulaga's assessment of the new coaching staff headed by Brandon Staley.

"There are a lot of outside factors and benefits coming here," Linsley said. "But I wouldn't have decided to come here if it wasn't for the great things that Bryan said. The vibe that he got from the coaching staff, everything he said. It meant a lot to me."

Bulaga probably will be the only returning starter up front as he attempts to bounce back from a season full of injuries and disappointment. Bulaga played only 38% of the Chargers' offensive snaps a year ago. That's the second-lowest total of his career, above only a 2017 season in which he missed 11 games.

Along with Linsley, the Chargers also signed former Pittsburgh lineman Matt Feiler in free agency. Feiler will play guard, although Friday he said he hasn't been told which side.

Feiler also has played tackle, and the versatility can only help the Chargers coming off a season in which the right side of their offensive line had to be continually shuffled because of injuries.

So the Chargers still need a left tackle and another guard, with plenty of offseason and salary cap space still to find answers.

They most certainly believe they have their center, signing Linsley to a five-year deal that guarantees him $26 million and is worth up to $62.5 million.

"It really doesn't mean anything unless I perform to that level," he said. "I'm excited and thankful that the Chargers thought enough of me to offer me that contract. ... I owe them."

New Charger Linsley looking to prove contract is worth it

By Joe Reedy
Associated Press
March 17, 2021

COSTA MESA, Calif. (AP) — Corey Linsley is the NFL's highest-paid center after signing with the Los Angeles Chargers, but he realizes that means added pressure when training camp begins later this year.

"It feels good but it really doesn't mean anything unless I perform to that level," Linsley said. "I was telling my wife when it was starting to ramp up, we were talking about teams that needed centers and I said, 'Look, we're going to a place that fits. This is a job. I'll be at the beach sometimes, but I got to live up to the contract that the team will give me. It's a job first and foremost.'"

Linsley, whose five-year contract averages $12.5 million per season, and guard Matt Feiler were introduced as members of the Chargers on Friday. Both arrived in Southern California on Thursday and began meeting with coaches.

Both players are hoping to improve a Chargers offensive line that struggled last season, but Linsley will be looked upon to be the leader. The All-Pro spent seven seasons with Green Bay after being drafted in the fifth round in 2014 and has 99 regular-season and 11 postseason starts.

His other main job will be to keep the pocket clean for Justin Herbert, which didn't happen last season. Herbert was the Offensive Rookie of the Year, but was one of the most pressured quarterbacks in the league last season. Linsley allowed a league-low four pressures last season among centers who played 13 or more games, while LA's Dan Feeney was tied for the most at 33.

Linsley is also solid in the run game with only four blown blocks in 286 plays, but none resulting in lost yards. By comparison, Feeney had 16 blown blocks in 433 rushing snaps with a league-high 10 being plays that were stopped behind the line of scrimmage.

Currently, right tackle Bryan Bulaga is the only starter on the line likely to be back. With that status of offseason programs undetermined, Linsley knows there might not be a lot of time to build consistency.

"At the end of the day we got to get reps, we all gotta get on the same page, we got to learn how to communicate effectively in the room, not only on the field," he said. "That's going to take time, and we're gonna have to put in the work."

Linsley and Bulaga played together for five seasons in Green Bay, so that familiarity will be a plus. Linsley said Bulaga made a nice recruiting pitch to get him to come to Southern California, but that he hasn't had a chance to catch up with Herbert yet.

Feiler started at right tackle and left guard over the past three years with the Pittsburgh Steelers. He is likely to line up at left guard, where he started 13 games last season. The Steelers allowed only 70 regular-season sacks over the past three seasons, the fewest in the league.

Feiler said the coaching staff has told him he will line up at guard, but haven't specified which side. Right guard Trai Turner was released while left guard Forrest Lamp is a free agent.

"It was a little choppy at first. Switching your stance up to the other side, it's a little bit different," said Feiler of transitioning from tackle to guard. "I've played left guard before, so it was kind of like riding a bike. Just had to shake the rust off and get back into it."

RASHAWN SLATER

Chargers rookie Rashawn Slater's football love affair: 'The sacrifices only made it grow fonder'

By Daniel Popper
The Athletic
August 2, 2021

Reggie Slater wanted his two oldest sons to love basketball the way he did.

He had devoted his life to the game, going from undersized and undrafted to an eight-year NBA veteran. He played all over the world: Spain, Turkey, Italy. He had even spent two seasons playing in the now-defunct Continental Basketball League. He loved the game, and it loved him back. This was his calling, his passion. And he was determined to pass it on to his oldest sons R.J. and Rashawn.

The boys, though, gravitated to the gridiron. There was mystery in football. Reggie had never played. Kids needed their parents to sign a permission slip to start football when Reggie was growing up in the '80s, and his mom refused. "She thought I was going to get broke up too easy," Reggie recalls. So she directed him to the gym.

R.J. and Rashawn's conscious minds were made up. They loved football. Still, Reggie was undeterred. He decided to try and coax their subconscious minds instead.

Late at night, after R.J. and Rashawn had gone to bed, Reggie would check on his sons. He quietly opened the door to the bedroom and made sure they were still sleeping. Then he tiptoed his 6-foot-7 basketball frame across the floor, leaned his head down and whispered "basketball" in their ears.

"It never worked," Reggie said, laughing.

R.J., two years older than Rashawn, led the way, as big brothers do. Football was different. It was his own path. And he loved the physicality football offered. Rashawn felt the same pull. "Sibling admiration," Reggie says.

In the Slaters' hometown of Sugar Land, Texas, a new sports love affair was blossoming — foreign for Reggie, but undeniably magnetic for R.J. and Rashawn.

On paper, Rashawn Slater was destined for the basketball court. He had all the resources a kid could ask for — namely, the right athletic genes and an experienced father who was a willing and avid teacher.

But the heart is a fickle beast. Quick feet, natural strength and a 6-foot-5 build can be passed down from father to son. But desires? Those are generated and cultivated by the individual.

Rashawn desired, craved to be on the football field, to achieve greatness there.

And thus started his journey to the Los Angeles Chargers.

Rashawn entered into that unknown, onto that blank page, and willed himself to this point — to the highest levels of the sport he loves — through determination, through 6 a.m. wakeup calls at 15 years old, through three-hour workouts in the Houston summer sun, through late-night film sessions.

“He just had a drive at a very young age,” R.J. said. “He knew what he wanted, and he was going to work for it despite what anybody says.”

Rashawn Slater’s athletic career started with a wide array of activities. Soccer. Baseball. Yes, basketball. Even taekwondo.

Reggie owned a gym in the Houston area. One section of the gym was a martial arts studio, and Rashawn took lessons there starting in middle school. He also competed. More like dominated.

“He was in matches and people were trying to bow out because he was a big kid and he was knocking the shit out of everybody,” Reggie said. “People didn’t even want to fight against him, man.”

No weight classes in sixth grade.

“He kicked the guy and it was something out of a Marvel movie,” Reggie said. “He’d get up, whoop somebody’s ass, and then sit down for two or three hours. The matches weren’t long. I can tell you that.”

On Saturdays, Reggie would beckon R.J. and Rashawn to the family’s outdoor basketball hoop. In the driveway, Reggie would run his sons through drills — dribbling with both hands, layups, footwork, mid-range jumpers.

When they were done, R.J. and Rashawn would scamper inside to the couch and turn on college football.

Reggie might not have been able to foster a love of basketball. But there was still plenty to impart. So Reggie would sit down beside his sons and tell stories from his career and life — not necessarily to draw them back to basketball, but to instill his pillars and values: work ethic, professionalism, drive, determination, focus, loyalty.

These stories and discussions were filled with pet idioms. Writers are taught to avoid cliches. Reggie basked in them, lived by them, parented by them. Sometimes, cliches are cliches for a reason.

“He’s just always been in our ear,” Rashawn said. “We didn’t know it at the time, but all that stuff he was telling us, it was kind of shaping us under our skin.”

The people that do well are the people that do what others aren’t willing to do.

Talk is cheap. Actions are way louder.

You can sit and point fingers, or you can just get better.

Control the situation; don’t let the situation control you.

Enjoy what you can enjoy while you can, but once the job’s at hand, it’s time to go to work.

These are the lessons Reggie learned in his playing days, from veterans such as Buck Williams, Kevin Willis and Charles Oakley.

Reggie would field calls from former teammates while in the car. They would reminisce and cycle through what-ifs from their careers. Rashawn would be in the passenger seat, listening intently, internalizing these valuable nuggets.

“Here’s the recipe,” Reggie said. “It’s up to you to put it all together.”

That recipe applies to football, just as it applies to basketball.

That is because it applies to life.

“As we worked, we saw it happen,” R.J. said. “It just became real and it became what we did.”

These idioms were the street lamps illuminating Rashawn’s path.

The boys both attended Clements High School in Sugar Land, their local public school. Clements played in the fierce and competitive Fort Bend district, part of the top flight of Texas high school football reserved for the largest schools. Clements was the district punching bag. They went 3-27 in Rashawn’s four seasons.

Rashawn had opportunities to play for private schools.

But he refused. Don’t point fingers. Get better.

Still, garnering recruiting recognition was like hiking through mud. R.J. was a quality high school football player and had interest from Ivy League schools. He ultimately decided to enroll and play at the Air Force Academy.

Rashawn watched his brother’s recruiting process and had an epiphany. He needed to get better — much better — if he wanted to reach his goal of playing at a high-profile Division I program.

“In Rashawn’s eye, if his brother was that good, and he wasn’t highly recruited, what is it that I need to do?” Reggie said.

Reggie owned that gym, Slater’s Sports Zone in Fort Bend, Texas. And there, local trainer Alonzo Ford was renting out space to work with Houston high school athletes. Ford worked in tandem with Antoine Murphy, a former Baylor offensive lineman and NFL camp body who specializes in offensive and defensive line development.

One day, Ford saw Rashawn playing basketball with his dad. He was big — very big — and light on his feet.

Ford approached Reggie in the parking lot.

“Man, you got to bring your son to me,” he remembered saying.

“He saw a prime specimen ready to be molded,” Reggie said.

Then the work began.

Ford headed the strength and conditioning. Murphy oversaw the football-specific training.

Together, they helped Rashawn groom into a Division I prospect.

Murphy, in particular, was essential in teaching Rashawn the details of the position that laid the groundwork for the pinpoint and polished technique that made him a first-round pick.

“At an early point, I realized that you put yourself ahead by the way you work, but you also put yourself ahead by the way you execute technique,” Rashawn said. “Everyone is strong, everyone is fast. But do you have great technique? That’s when it started to build.”

Ford pushed Rashawn physically, concocting exercises and workouts to test his pupil’s genetic gifts. He put 500 pounds on the workout sled. He had Rashawn put one leg in a suspended loop and then jump with the other leg onto a 24-inch box.

Murphy remembers meeting Rashawn for the first time.

“Big glasses,” he said. “So he looked kind of like a Poindexter kind of guy.”

But then Murphy saw him move.

“He could run like the wind and he could run all day,” Murphy said.

The glasses were misleading. Rashawn can come across as quiet and unassuming. He even says that during the pre-draft process, teams accused him of being “too nice.”

Rashawn’s response? “You’ve never watched the film.”

“I kind of have the ability to flip a switch like that,” he said.

Murphy saw it firsthand during those years of training. If Rashawn was getting ready to “lock in,” he would take off his glasses and hand them to Murphy.

“That’s how he gets if you beat him or if you do something that he feels like got a little dirty on him,” Murphy said. “When he hands you those glasses and he’s sweating profusely, that’s when you know, uh oh, it’s on now.”

“He’d go Clark Kent on them boys,” R.J. said.

Rashawn lived in the trenches as a high school player. He played every snap of the game as an offensive and defensive lineman. He had 10 sacks as a senior defensive end, earning All-District honors for offensive and defensive line.

Rashawn trained at both spots with Murphy.

“He would just beat guys,” Murphy said. “I had guys that were getting recruited by every school in America, and he would just beat them consistently and beat them easily and kind of put their mindset in the dumps. He would just do it easily, run back to me just laughing. ‘Ha, ha, ha.’ Just giggling.

“He’s approachable. He’s well-spoken. He’s sweet,” Murphy said. “But I’m telling you, if you make him mad, or when it’s time to turn the lights on and he’s focused, he turns into the Hulk.”

Ford and Murphy trained a group of local high school players, including Will Farrar and Dakota Crawford, two offensive linemen at Travis High School, and Dennis Osagiede, a defensive lineman at Ridge Point. All three went on to play college football.

The group saw Rashawn flipping that switch every day.

"If you look at him, yeah, he's a big guy," Osagiede said. "But his demeanor isn't like, oh, he's a fucking crusher. Nah. You just got to get in that ring with him. Ya feel me? You got to get on that field with him, and then you'll see."

"That dude is a whole different animal when you piss him off," Crawford said.

The weeks during the football season were long and arduous. On top of his high school responsibilities, Rashawn was spending four days a week either training or studying with Ford and Murphy.

"That's all I've known him as — a hard-working silent assassin," Ford said.

Murphy developed Rashawn's hand placement and usage by working him out on a boxing heavy bag. He regularly would go over to the family's house to watch film with Rashawn upstairs. There, his football IQ took center stage.

"He's a scholar," Murphy said. "He doesn't want to be surprised during the game."

This eventually led Rashawn to create an idiom of his own.

"He says he feels most confident when he's most prepared," Reggie said. "I've heard him say that. I'm like, 'Damn, that's a great quote! I wish I had told you guys that.'"

The sessions with Ford and Murphy went year-round, including three times a week in the spring. Miles and miles of running, followed by footwork in the sand volleyball courts at the local park.

Inside, timed sprints on the basketball courts. Speed, conditioning, agility and technique work.

Osagiede, Farrar and Crawford became numb to Rashawn's superhuman workout feats.

"He is so explosive, it's ridiculous," Crawford said.

The summer Houston heat was stifling. And Rashawn, well ...

"That dude is the sweatiest person I've ever seen," Crawford said.

"I'd come home, and he had his laundry hamper that was filled with soaking wet, sweaty clothes, because sometimes he'd work out twice a day," Reggie said. "I knew that they were doing something positive there."

Murphy would bring film cutups of NFL offensive linemen — Tyron Smith, Jason Peters, Andrew Whitworth — and watch with his players before and after their training sessions.

"I can remember waking up early on Saturdays at 6 a.m. and it would be me, Rashawn, Coach Ford and Coach Murphy just working," Farrar said.

The workouts were ultra-competitive.

"When we went through one-on-ones, I knew I had to come with my shit if I wanted to win the rep or even like faze him," Osagiede said.

Osagiede trained with Rashawn for three years.

"I can count on my hand how many times I beat him in reps," he said.

Fueling all this was Rashawn's inquisitive mind and unquenchable thirst for greatness.

"He took care of business at a young age," Ford said.

Reggie remembers when a Northwestern recruiter came to the house to visit with Rashawn.

Typically those visits are simply sales pitches. Not with Rashawn.

"They were going over techniques," Reggie said. "They went into the living room and moved some furniture and started talking about how do I become a better, more skilled NCAA player. It was very unusual. I'm sitting there eating brisket and biscuits. And these guys are in stances, talking about pad level."

Once Rashawn committed to Northwestern, he "never wavered," according to Murphy. After his standout senior season on both sides of the ball, bigger programs came calling. But they stood no chance.

"He made his mind up and gave his word," Murphy said. "It's over."

There, the foundation that Murphy and Ford laid allowed Rashawn to blossom. He started for three years, first at right tackle and then at left tackle, before opting out of the 2020 season. He spent the fall working in Dallas with offensive line coach Duke Manyweather to prepare for the draft.

Rashawn never forgot the programs that passed on him.

"I've been an underdog my whole life," Rashawn said. "It's not leaving, because that's just part of who I am now."

His commitment only strengthened in college. The Slaters — including Reggie's wife, Katie, the couple's daughter Aliyah and youngest son Rylan — went on a cruise after Rashawn had finished his freshman season and started 12 games at right tackle.

The family lounged in pool chairs, sipped on piña coladas and ate at the buffet. Relaxed. But there was often one seat left empty.

Cruise-goers, including his own family members, looked on, befuddled and bewildered.

"Obviously, he got made fun of," R.J. said. "The pass pro set looks kind of goofy sometimes. But that man did not shy away from busting it out anywhere, because he was going to hone his craft regardless of where he was. If it was a vacation or not, he was going to get better."

This was deeper than early wake-up calls or exhausting workouts. This was a lifestyle, a love affair.

A calling.

"That extra level that a lot of people don't get to," R.J. said.

Moments after the Chargers selected Rashawn with the 13th pick in April's draft, the baby-faced offensive tackle was asked on the ESPN broadcast for his message to his new quarterback Justin Herbert.

"I got your back," replied Rashawn, the franchise's new cornerstone left tackle.

For most, this was merely a generic stock answer. Player-speak. A cliché.

But, to the Slaters, clichés are clichés for a reason. They are not throwaway sayings. They are defining, essential principles.

They are how you create your own destiny.

Ford was watching the draft from a barbershop while his son got a haircut.

"That put chills through my body," Ford said, "because he's been a man of his word for so long. ... I hope this quarterback understands he means that. No one is going to touch that guy. I'm putting my life on the line for this one."

Basketball is in Rashawn's blood. Football is in his heart.

A different game. A familiar devotion.

"He still has a love for the game that I feel like a lot of people lose once you get to the level of sacrifice he's taken," R.J. said. "But I feel like the sacrifices only made it grow fonder for him."

JERRY TILLERY

It's gotta be the socks? How Chargers' Jerry Tillery is setting himself apart

INGLEWOOD, Calif. -- At 6-foot-6, 295 pounds, Los Angeles Chargers defensive end Jerry Tillery can be difficult to find on a football field, especially one filled with 80 players, many of whom are similar in size.

But shift your gaze down to the feet. And you spot him right away, even from the length of a football field. The red and white striped socks give him away every time.

"Something new, something fresh," he says after practice. "I wear them every day."

The socks are just one way Tillery sets himself apart. They're just the most obvious.

He's a voracious reader and is curious about their world, having made trips to Japan, Dublin and South Africa while he was honing his craft at Notre Dame. He ended being selected No. 28 overall in the 2019 draft.

He's big and strong (not to mention fashionable) and has yet to reach his potential. The Chargers expect that to happen this year and in first-year coach Brandon Staley's defensive schemes.

"The new staff (and defense) was like a breath of fresh air into my game," he said. "I love it. It's tailor made for me to make to make a lot of plays."

Teammates say they've seen a difference in Tillery, too.

"This year, Jerry, I think he's taken it to another level to be an elite rusher," fellow defensive lineman Linval Joseph said. "He's been asking questions. He's been in the weight room. He hasn't been complaining. He's the first in the locker room. He's been doing the things that you have to do to be great."

Tillery has five sacks and 47 combined tackles in 31 career games. He was second to Joey Bosa with 14 quarterback hits last season, a sizable uptick from the three he had as a rookie in 2019.

"We feel like (Tillery) has got a chance to be a complete player," Staley said. "This guy's a lot more tough, physical and rugged in the run game than I was expecting."

Tillery spent the summer training on Oahu, except for a quick jaunt to Eugene, Oregon, for Justin Herbert's charity golf tournament. "When Herbie calls, you answer," he explained, "the whole team does."

"He doesn't even know how good he is," Tillery said of Herbert. "And he's even a better guy."

Tillery's Oahu workouts were tough and sweat-filled, as you might expect.

"I worked on my feet, my ankles, anything to help me play faster," he said. "And increase my fitness to play faster."

He said Staley's "health first" approach has been refreshing and helpful to everyone who's had even a minor injury, noting they had several major ones before camp broke last season.

Tillery says he will still have his hand in the dirt like a typical defensive lineman, but there are plays he will be standing up under Staley's system, designed to keep the offense guessing.

And he says his Hawaiian workouts have put him in "my best shape ever." He's also promised to cut down on penalties after accruing eight for 59 yards in 2020.

"The team expects a lot from me, and I have high expectations for myself," he said. "Coach Staley has definitely brought a different approach, a new staff, a new lease on football."
