COMMUNITY GROUPS AT TRAINING CAMP

ILB Ray Lewis

The Ravens have hosted special groups from the surrounding Baltimore community at this year's training camp, which has been held at the Under Armour Performance Center in Owings Mills, MD. Among these groups were Casey Cares, a non-profit organization that works with the families of critically ill children to provide them with opportunities to relax and enjoy themselves; Under Armour's Wounded Warrior Project, a group of military service members who have been wounded while serving our country; and Special Olympics of Maryland, a group that encourages the growth of individuals with special needs through physical activity. Other groups that attended included the Baltimore County and Baltimore City Police Athletic Leagues, Boys and Girls Clubs of Harford County, Boys Hope, Girls Hope, My Sister's Circle, PATHWAYS and St. Vincent's Center- all of which were comprised of youth from the Baltimore area. The Ravens also hosted families with special situations, including one involved with the Make-A-Wish Foundation. All children from the groups were invited to autograph sessions and player meet-and-greets at the conclusion of practice.

OPEN PRACTICE AT NAVAL ACADEMY

On Aug. 12, the Ravens held a training camp practice at Navy-Marine Corps Memorial Stadium in Annapolis, MD. This marked the first year that the Ravens practiced at the Naval Academy's facility, a long-time goal of owner Steve Bisciotti, who was raised near Annapolis. The practice was open to the public and one of three off-site sessions conducted by the Ravens during camp. Concessions were available to all fans and cold tailgating was allowed in the parking lots. At the conclusion of practice, which drew over 20,000 fans, children were directed to the front three rows of the stadium to receive autographs from players.
