REGULAR SEASON - GAME 13

WASHINGTON REDSKINS (4-8) vs. NEW ENGLAND PATRIOTS (9-3)

Sunday, Dec. 11 — 1 p.m. ET
FedExField (85,000) — Landover, Md.

REDSKINS HOST PATRIOTS IN WEEK 14

The Washington Redskins will play host to their second straight AFC East opponent in Week 14 as they face the New England Patriots on Sunday, Dec. 11. Kickoff from FedExField is set for 1 p.m. ET.

The game will be broadcast on CBS with Greg Gumbel calling the play-by-play and Dan Dierdorf providing color analysis. The contest can be heard on the Redskins Radio Network with Larry Michael on the call and Pro Football Hall of Famers and Redskins legends Sam Huff and Sonny Jurgensen adding color analysis, and Rick "Doc" Walker reporting from the sidelines.

The Redskins offense features rookie running back Roy Helu, who is coming off of a 100-yard performance last week vs. the New York Jets. That followed a 108-yard day at Seattle a week earlier, making Helu the first Redskins rookie running back since Reggie Brooks in 1993 to post consecutive 100-yard rushing performances. This week, Helu can become the first rookie to post three consecutive 100-yard rushing games in the 79-year history of the Redskins.

ALUMNI CENTER

Formally organized in 1958, the Washington Redskins Alumni Association was the first organization of its kind in the country. The organization spearheaded the alumni movement among former professional football players and was the model for other alumni groups that later formed in all NFL cities.

The primary objectives of the Redskins Alumni are "promoting a continuing interest in current and past players of the Washington Redskins" and "promoting and fostering interest and funding for charitable purposes." With respect to the latter, the alumni conduct fundraising events to raise money that can be donated to charitable organizations or used in other ways to help improve the quality of life for youth in the Greater Washington community.

Today, Redskins alumni continue to make their presence known throughout the community. As a very active chapter of the NFL Alumni Association, their motto is "Caring for Kids." In addition to the numerous events and appearances, Redskins Alumni participate in throughout the year, they hold two major fundraising events of their own — the Redskins Alumni Charity Golf Classic, now in its 33rd year, and the annual Washington Redskins Welcome Home Luncheon, now in its 50th year. Mark Moseley currently resides as president of the Redskins Alumni Association.

The alumni have an office at Redskins Park and can be reached at 703-726-7488. Since his arrival in Washington as Executive Vice President/General Manager in December of 2009, Bruce Allen has made it a priority to build a bridge to the franchise's glorious past.

That heritage was honored once again in August when former Redskin great Chris Hanburger was enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame in Canton, Ohio. He was presented by his son, Chris. Hanburger was voted into the Hall after being a nominee of the seniors committee. In all, he waited 28 years to be elected.

Hanburger joins Darrell Green (2008), Art Monk (2008) and Russ Grimm (2010) to make four players who spent the majority of their careers with the Redskins to earn the honor in the past four years. In addition, former Redskins Bruce Smith (2009) and Deion Sanders (2011) have also been elected over that time. Hanburger said of his election to the Hall of Fame: "It's wonderful, I'm overwhelmed. It's just such a tremendous honor to even be nominated, let alone, be voted in. You have to think about all of the men that played before I did, certainly the men that I played with and against, and then you look at the guys playing now. It's just a select few that make it in. I was fortunate to play with players on the Redskins defense that made it all work for me."

The Washington Redskins picked North Carolina linebacker Chris Hanburger in the 18th round of the 1965 NFL Draft. The All-American started to make his mark late in his rookie season as he began to form a reputation as a player who made big plays. Soon thereafter he assumed the role as the "quarterback" of the Redskins defense while becoming one of the most dependable and steady linebackers of his era.

Hanburger was an integral part of the dominant Redskins teams of the 1970s. At the same time that Washington was rising to the top of the NFL, Hanburger began earning national acclaim. He was selected first-team All-Pro four times in a five-season span from 1972-76 and named All-Eastern Conference in 1968 and 1969 and All-NFC six times in seven seasons from 1970 to 1976. Hanburger was also voted to nine Pro Bowls in his 14-season career.

His performance in the 1972 season gained him perhaps his greatest notoriety as he helped lead the Redskins to its first Super Bowl berth.

"I am so happy for Chris," Redskins Owner Daniel Snyder said following the announcement. "He was one of the era's most dominating players and is well deserving of this honor. Not only did he make nine Pro Bowls, Chris was the captain of the defense and was a true coach on the field. This is a great day for the entire Redskins' organization."

Allen echoed Snyder's sentiments.

"I think it's a great day for the Redskins, our fans and all of Chris' teammates," Allen said. "It shows that a person who is dedicated to the game and is passionate and didn't care about his own personal glory, but cared about his teammates can be rewarded, and that is special."

On Aug. 24, the Washington Redskins Charitable Foundation and Redskins Alumni Association hosted the 50th annual Redskins Welcome Home Luncheon Wednesday, August 24th at the Marriott Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, DC.

The luncheon is the only event where fans and corporate partners have the chance to spend time with the entire Redskins team. Each table featured at least one player, coach or alumnus seated with attendees. The luncheon included unique live and silent auction items, door prizes, and speeches from Executive Vice Presidents Bruce Allen and Mike Shanahan.

The event also included the announcement of the 2010 Redskins Players of the Year, and the inaugural recipient of the Washington Redskins Community Service Award. Receiver Santana Moss accepted the Offensive Player of the Year Award, linebacker Brian Orakpo received the Defensive Player of the Year award, and Lorenzo Alexander was named the Special Teams Player of the Year. Linebacker London Fletcher received the team's first Washington Redskins Community Service Award.

Proceeds from the event benefitted the youth programs of the Washington Redskins Charitable Foundation and Redskins Alumni Association.

On Nov. 6, the Washington Redskins welcomed back more than 90 former players, coaches and staff members to FedExField for the team's annual Homecoming game. Before the 1 p.m. game against the San Francisco 49ers, Redskins Alumni posed for a team photo and took part in team introductions as they and their family members were honored in a pre-game ceremony. Larry Brown, Jim Lachey, Bobby Mitchell, Charley Taylor and Hanburger were among the list of Redskins' greats in attendance at Sunday's game. Hanburger, who played linebacker for the Redskins, addressed fans from the field after being presented with his Hall of Fame ring at halftime.

WHAT TO LOOK FOR THIS WEEK

The Redskins and Patriots meeting for the ninth time, with the Redskins holding a 6-2 all-time advantage.

Redskins Head Coach Mike Shanahan earning his 165th overall victory as head coach.

Wide receiver Anthony Armstrong having 32 receiving yards to reach 1,000 for his career.

Kick returner Brandon Banks improving upon his league-leading 39 kickoff returns.

Banks adding to his 904 kickoff return yards, which are second in the NFL (Joe McKnight – 940).

Cornerback Kevin Barnes adding to his single-season career-high total in interceptions (two).

Defensive end Stephen Bowen adding to his career-high totals in sacks. He currently has 4.5.

Defensive end Adam Carriker adding to his career-high totals in sacks. He currently has five.

Nose tackle Barry Cofield adding to his existing career-high total in passes defended. He currently has eight, which leads the NFL for defensive tackles.

Tight end Fred Davis improving on his career-high 796 receiving yards for a season, which are third-most in the NFL by a tight end.

Davis improving on his career-high 59 receptions, which are fifth-most by a tight end in the NFL.

Linebacker London Fletcher extending the longest consecutive starts streak among active linebackers to 176 and extending his consecutive games played streak to 221, tied for the most among non-specialists.

Fletcher improving his NFL lead in total tackles (124), according to STATS, INC.

Wide receiver Jabar Gaffney starting the 100th game of his career.

Quarterback Rex Grossman passing for more than 200 yards in five consecutive games.

Running back Roy Helu improving on his 42 receptions, which lead all rookie running backs in the NFL.

Helu becoming the first Redskins rookie running back in team history to post three consecutive 100-yard rushing games.

Kerrigan improving on his four forced fumbles, which are tied for the third-most in the NFL and are a Redskins rookie record.

Kerrigan forcing his fifth fumble to tie Ken Harvey (1995) and Bruce Smith (2000) for second-most forced fumbles in a season in team history, according to STATS, INC.

Safety LaRon Landry recording .5 sacks to reach two for the season, which would establish a new single-season career high.

Wide receiver Santana Moss catching his 35th touchdown as a member of the Redskins to tie Ricky Sanders for seventh-most in franchise history.

Moss climbing the all-time career receptions list, as his 627 are 46th-most in NFL history among wide receivers and 10th among active players. Additionally, he is tied for ninth among active players in touchdown receptions with 54.

Moss needing 70 receiving yards to reach 9,000 for his career.

Rocca improving on his 25 punts inside the 20-yard line, which are tied for the NFL lead. Three more would tie his career high, set in 2010.

Rocca chasing Matt Turk's franchise record for net punting average (39.2). Rocca is currently averaging 40.5 net yards per punt.

Cornerback Josh Wilson recording the 10th interception of his career. He currently has nine.

The Redskins are one of only three teams in the NFL (Baltimore and Houston) with four different players having at least 4.5 sacks.

The Redskins having a fifth different player post 100 receiving yards in a game this season, which would be the first time the team has done so since 1981 (Terry Metcalf, Art Monk, Virgil Seay, Ricky Thompson and Joe Washington). Fred Davis, Jabar Gaffney, Leonard Hankerson and Roy Helu all have 100-yard receiving games this season.

On Sunday, Redskins running back Roy Helu will attempt to become the first rookie in team history to rush for 100 yards in three consecutive games.

NOTES FROM LAST WEEK

All notes accurate as of the conclusion of last Sunday's 4 p.m. games.*

Attendance for the game was 74,121. The game was the Redskins' 366th consecutive sellout, including preseason, regular season and playoffs. All 146 regular season, postseason and preseason games at FedExField have been sellouts.

Rookie running back Roy Helu rushed 23 times for 100 yards with a touchdown. Helu's 23 carries matched his career high, set last week at Seattle.

Helu has rushed for at least 100 yards in two consecutive games, making him the first Redskins rookie running back to do so since Reggie Brooks in Weeks 10-11 in 1993.

Helu capped the Redskins' opening drive with a 2-yard touchdown run. It was the second touchdown of his career and his second in as many weeks.

Helu's touchdown run marked the second consecutive game in which the Redskins scored a touchdown on their opening drive. The last time the Redskins scored touchdowns on opening drives in consecutive games was in Weeks 12-13 of the 2009 season, when the Redskins scored opening-drive touchdowns at Philadelphia on Nov. 29 and vs. New Orleans on Dec. 6.

Helu rushed for a season-best 63 first-half yards on 11 carries. His previous best was 55 yards in the first half last week at Seattle.

Tight end Fred Davis finished with six receptions for 99 yards and recorded a season-long 42-yard reception on the Redskins' opening drive.

Davis became the first tight end in Redskins history to reach 80 receiving yards or more in six games in a single season. Redskins tight ends had previously twice compiled five games of 80-plus receiving yards in a season in team history (Chris Cooley in 2007 and Bill Anderson in 1959).

Davis had two receptions of at least 30 yards, becoming the first Redskins tight end with two receptions of 30 or more yards in a game since Stephen Alexander on Dec. 16, 2000 at Pittsburgh, a span of 172 regular season games.

Davis had 82 receiving yards in the first half, the highest first-half total of his career. It also tied his previous high for most amount of yardage in any half, tying his 82-yard second half vs. the New York Giants in Week 1.

Wide receiver Santana Moss became the fourth-leading receiver by yardage in Redskins history with 42 receiving yards on six receptions. Moss, who now has 6,514 yards during his time in Washington, surpassed Pro Football Hall of Famer Bobby Mitchell, who had 6,492 receiving yards as a member of the Redskins.

Nose tackle Barry Cofield batted down two passes, improving upon his single-season career high, which now stands at eight and leads NFL defensive tackles this season.

Linebacker Brian Orakpo improved upon his single-season career high in passes defended, which now stands at four.

Linebacker Perry Riley recorded the first fumble recovery of his career in the second quarter, recovering a muffed punt by New York's Patrick Turner.

Linebacker London Fletcher played in his 220th consecutive game, tied with Tampa Bay cornerback Ronde Barber for the most among active non-specialists. It was also his 175th consecutive start, the most among active linebackers.

Punter Sav Rocca placed four punts inside the 20-yard line, giving him 25 punts downed inside the opponents' 20-yard line this season. That total matched his season high of four, set vs. the New York Giants in Week 1.

Anthony Armstrong registered his first career kickoff return, taking a lateral from Brandon Banks on a reverse for 28 yards.

Rookie running back Evan Royster recorded the first reception of his career, catching a 3-yard pass in the second quarter.

Brandon Banks had six kickoff returns for 136 yards. Following Sunday's early games, Banks leads the NFC with 904 kick return yards on a league-leading 39 returns.

The Redskins finished with 164 kick return yards, the team's highest total since Nov. 15, 2010 vs. Philadelphia.

Tight end Logan Paulsen received his third start of the 2011 season and the third start of his career.

The Redskins held the Jets to 266 yards of offense one week after holding the Seattle Seahawks to 250 yards of offense. This marks the first time since Weeks 6-7 of the 2009 season that the Redskins have held opponents under 300 yards of offense in consecutive weeks.

Redskins linebacker London Fletcher played in his 220th consecutive game last Sunday. According to NFL GSIS, Fletcher leads the league in tackles this season (124).

Mike Shanahan is in his second season as the Redskins' Executive Vice President/Head Coach. He is one of 12 head coaches in league history to guide a club to a pair of Super Bowl victories and one of six to accomplish the feat in consecutive years.

Shanahan has the 15th-most regular season wins (156) by a head coach in NFL history and ranks second in that category among active coaches (Bill Belichick – 171) and first in the NFC. Including eight postseason victories, Shanahan's 164 overall wins are 15th all-time and are also second among active coaches to Belichick. In 17-plus seasons as a head coach with the Washington Redskins (2010-) Denver Broncos (1995-2008) and Los Angeles Raiders (1988-89), Shanahan has a regular season winning percentage of .574 (156-116) and an overall winning percentage of .575 (164-121).

Shanahan became the 28th head coach in Redskins history on January 6, 2010. In his first season in Washington, Shanahan guided the Redskins to a two-win improvement over the 2009 campaign. His club set franchise season records for overtime victories (3) and completions (349), and registered the third-highest gross passing yards total in team annals. In addition, the 2010 Redskins registered a touchdown pass in 15 consecutive games for the first time in club history and led the NFL with nine completions of at least 50 yards, including one in four consecutive games for the first time since 1987.

Defensively, the Redskins recorded 27 takeaways on the season, which was their most since 2005 (28), including 14 interceptions, which tied for their most since 2005 (16). Washington registered at least two takeaways in six consecutive games from Weeks 2-8, the first time the franchise had done so in the same season since 1995. The unit placed linebackers London Fletcher and Brian Orakpo and cornerback DeAngelo Hall on the NFC Pro Bowl team. In his 26 seasons as an NFL coach, Shanahan has had 47 different players earn a total of 95 berths in the Pro Bowl.

During his NFL coaching career, Shanahan has been a part of teams that have played in 10 AFC or NFC Championship Games. He has coached in six Super Bowls – five with Denver and Super Bowl XXIX with San Francisco. In his nine seasons coaching at the collegiate level, Shanahan's teams participated in eight bowl games and won two national championships (Oklahoma – 1975 and Eastern Illinois – 1978).

In his tenure with the Broncos, Shanahan guided the franchise to two Super Bowl victories, three conference championship game appearances, seven postseason berths and nine winning seasons. He joined Vince Lombardi, Don Shula, Chuck Noll, Jimmy Johnson and Belichick as one of six coaches with back-to-back Super Bowl championships. Shanahan led Denver to 138 regular-season victories in 14 seasons in Denver, a win total that marks the 10th-most by a head coach with one franchise in NFL history. Among the nine coaches who have more wins with one club than Shanahan, all eight who are eligible for the Pro Football Hall of Fame have been honored with membership. In the spring of 2010, Shanahan was inducted into the Colorado Sports Hall of Fame.

Shanahan arrived as head coach in Denver in 1995 from the World Champion San Francisco 49ers, where he served as offensive coordinator for three seasons (1992-94). The 49ers offense reached unprecedented levels under his leadership. San Francisco's three-year offensive averages under Shanahan's direction were the most productive in the history of pro football. His three-year averages included being No. 1 in the NFL in total points (an average of 469.7 per year), total touchdowns (60.3), rushing touchdowns (23.7), passing touchdowns (31.7), third-down efficiency (48.5%), total offense (6,230 yds.) and average yards per play (6.2).

San Francisco quarterback Steve Young re-wrote many NFL passing records and was named the NFL Most Valuable Player twice in his three years under Shanahan's guidance. In addition, Young threw for a record six touchdowns on his way to earning Super Bowl XXIX Most Valuable Player honors.

Shanahan was on the Broncos coaching staff for all three of their Super Bowl appearances in the 1980s (following the 1986, 1987 and 1989 seasons). He first went to Denver in 1984 as the club's wide receivers coach. He was promoted to offensive coordinator in 1985 and would serve the next three seasons in that capacity. Shanahan returned to Denver as quarterbacks coach on October 16, 1989, after serving as head coach of the Los Angeles Raiders in 1988 and through the first four games of the 1989 campaign.

Shanahan began his coaching career as an offensive assistant for Oklahoma in 1975-76, and the school won the national championship in his first year on its staff. In 1977, at the age of 24, he was hired as Northern Arizona's backfield coach and the Lumberjacks averaged a school-record 391.1 yards per game that season. A year later, Shanahan returned to his alma mater, Eastern Illinois, as offensive coordinator and helped guide the Panthers to the Division II national title. The year before Shanahan's arrival, the team was 1-10. In 1979, he served as offensive coordinator at Minnesota, where he implemented the run-and-shoot offense to help the Golden Gophers set 40 school offensive records.

Shanahan moved on to Florida the following year, inheriting the poorest offense in Division I football as well as a team record of 0-10-1. In Shanahan's four years at Florida, the team broke many offensive school records and went to four consecutive bowl games. During his stint as a college coach, his teams had a combined record of 78-29-2 (.725), won two national championships, and appeared in eight bowl games and four playoff contests.

A native of Oak Park, Ill. (8/24/52), Michael Edward Shanahan attended East Leyden High School in Franklin Park, Ill. He received a scholarship to Eastern Illinois University, where he played quarterback and earned bachelor's and master's degrees.

Shanahan and his wife, Peggy, have two children – son Kyle and daughter Krystal. Kyle is a graduate of the University of Texas and is the Redskins' offensive coordinator. Krystal also is a graduate of the University of Texas.

THE OPPONENT

The New England Patriots enter Week 14 with a 9-3 record after defeating the Indianapolis Colts, 31-24, last Sunday.

The Patriots are led by 12th-year Head Coach Bill Belichick, who has guided the team to three Super Bowl victories and a 171-97 regular season record during his tenure.

The Patriots' offense is led by six-time Pro Bowl quarterback Tom Brady, who has been at the helm for all three Super Bowl wins. This season, he has completed 306-of-459 passes for 3,916 yards, 30 touchdowns and 10 interceptions for a quarterback rating of 105.9. He is currently on pace to break quarterback Dan Marino's record for most passing yards in a season (5,084). In addition, he has been named NFL MVP two times, including in the 2010 season.

Running back BenJarvus Green-Ellis is the team's primary ball carrier. In 2011, he has carried the ball 156 times for 599 yards (3.8 avg.) and eight touchdowns. He also has six catches for 74 yards (6.2 avg.).

Three-time Pro Bowl wide receiver Wes Welker and second-year tight end Rob Gronkowski anchor the receiving corps. Welker leads the NFL in receptions (93) and receiving yards (1,253). He also has caught eight touchdowns. Gronkowski has hauled in 65 receptions for 928 yards and 13 touchdowns. Gronkowski is the fastest player to reach 20 career touchdown receptions. Further, with his next touchdown catch, he will tie the record for touchdown receptions in a season by a tight end.

Linebacker Jerod Mayo is the leader of the defense. In 2011, he has compiled 59 tackles (38 solo), one forced fumble and two passes defended. Defensive end Andre Carter leads the team in sacks with nine and he also had 47 tackles (29 solo), one forced fumble and one pass defended. Cornerback Kyle Arrington leads the NFL in interceptions with seven.

Stephen Gostkowski handles the kicking duties and Zoltan Mesko is the team's punter. Julian Edelman leads the team in punt returns with 21 for 251 yards (12.0 avg.) and a touchdown. He also leads the team in kick returns with 12 for 284 yards (23.7 avg.).

COACH BILL BELICHICK

Bill Belichick has led the Patriots to an 9-3 record entering Week 14 of his 37th season as an NFL coach. Belichick is the only head coach in NFL history to win three Super Bowl championships in a four-year span. He currently ranks 10th all time with 178 total victories as a head coach. His winning percentage of .639 ranks third in NFL history among coaches with 150 or more wins, trailing only George Halas (.682) and Don Shula (.666).

He has won more regular-season games (121) and more games overall (135) during a ten-year stretch (2001-2010) than any other head coach in NFL history.

Belichick is in his 12th season as the team's head coach. Through 11 seasons, Belichick has delivered three Super Bowl championships, four conference titles, eight division crowns and 14 playoff victories, while posting an overall record of 140-55. Belichick directed the Patriots to victories in Super Bowls XXXVI (2001), XXXVIII (2003) and XXXIX (2004), and in 2007 he became the only NFL head coach to guide his team to a 16-0 regular season.

Belichick's accomplishments have placed him among the elite coaches in NFL history. He owns a career record of 178-100 as a head coach, and his career winning percentage of .639 ranks third in NFL history among coaches with 150 or more wins, trailing only George Halas (.682) and Don Shula (.666). Belichick has compiled a career playoff record of 15-6, with his .714 playoff winning percentage placing third in NFL history behind Vince Lombardi (9-1, .900) and Tom Flores (8-3, .727). Belichick's 15 career playoff wins rank fifth all-time, while New England's 14 playoff victories in the 2000s are tied for the highest total in any decade in NFL history. Belichick's Pa-trioti have rarely been rattled, able to consistently maintain leads and bounce back following losses. Since the beginning of the 2003 season, New England is 25-2 (.923) in regular season games following a loss, dropping back-to-back regular-season contests just two times over that span. Another hallmark of Belichick's teams has been their ability to consistently succeed against top competition. The Patriots enter the 2011 season with a record of 39-11 (.780) against playoff teams since the beginning of the 2003 season.

In 2010, Belichick led a very young squad to an NFL-best 14-2 record, a division title, its eighth playoff appearance in his 11 seasons as New England's head coach and received several major awards in the process. Belichick was named Associated Press Coach of the Year for the third time, joining Don Shula (four-time winner) and Chuck Knox as the only three-time winners. In addition, Belichick earned Peter King's SI.com and Pro Football Weekly Coach of the Year.

Belichick has been honored with numerous awards in recognition of his success with the Patriots. He has earned NFL Coach of the Year honors by the Associated Press two times (2007 and 2003) and has finished in the top five in AP voting for NFL Coach of the Year Award eight times (1994, 2001, 2002, 2003, 2004, 2005, 2007, 2008 and 2010).

Belichick was born April 16, 1952 in Nashville, Tenn. and raised in Annapolis, Md. His father, Steve, played fullback for the Detroit Lions in 1941 and coached for 33 years at the Naval Academy. Bill was a standout prep athlete at Annapolis High, where he has since been inducted into the school's Hall of Fame. He attended Phillips Academy in Andover, Mass., before enrolling at Wesleyan, where he earned his bachelor's degree in economics in 1975.

SERIES HISTORY

Sunday's matchup at FedExField between the Redskins and the New England Patriots will mark the ninth regular season meeting between the two teams.

This will be the first time the Redskins have faced the Patriots since 2007. The Redskins own a 6-2 all-time series advantage. All meetings have come in the regular season.

Though the teams have played at New England six times, the Redskins have only hosted the Patriots twice. The Redskins are 2-0 in home against New England, 1-0 at RFK Stadium and 1-0 at FedExField.

LAST MEETING

Week 8: Patriots 52, Redskins 7

ESPN.com News Services
Oct. 28, 2007

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — The Patriots rolled up their highest point total in 28 years. Tom Brady threw his career-high 30th touchdown pass.

Pretty impressive, and there's still half a season to go.

New England's amazing year kept getting better Sunday with a 52-7 rout of Washington. The Redskins entered with the fifth-ranked defense in the NFL and left with the franchise's worst loss since 1961.

"I don't know of a weakness that they have," Washington coach Joe Gibbs said.

Brady threw for three touchdowns and ran for two more. Linebacker Mike Vrabel caught a touchdown pass and forced three fumbles by quarterback Jason Campbell that led to 17 points.

The Patriots (8-0) have scored at least 34 points in each game and have won each by 17 points or more. They've outscored opponents by an average of 41.3 to 15.9.

At this rate, they'll score 662 points, shattering the NFL single-season record of 556 set by Minnesota in 1998. The 52 points were their most since they scored 56 against the New York Jets in 1979.

Still, they followed the line of coach Bill Belichick: dwell on the mistakes so they're not repeated.

"It's a long season," Brady said. "It's not even November yet and we've got a lot of room for improvement left."

Now the first half of the season is over. Bring on the Super Bowl champs, the Colts (7-0), whose winning margin is a mere 32 to 14.6.

The Patriots play next Sunday at Indianapolis, where they had their last loss, more than nine months ago in the AFC Championship Game.

Let the hype begin.

"You've got to block out the noise," Patriots defensive end Ty Warren said. "If you start reading too much into what's going on out there outside this locker room, I think the battle's already lost."

Washington (4-3) avoided a shutout when Campbell threw a 15-yard touchdown pass to Chris Cooley with three minutes left.

By then, most of the fans had left, many of them likely rushing home to watch the Boston Red Sox try to win the World Series at the Colorado Rockies.

The Patriots are playing more like champions every week.

"You can't be perfect but you want to shoot for that," wide receiver Donte Stallworth said.

Brady completed 29 of 38 passes for 306 yards and no interceptions. He's been picked off just twice all season, although he did lose a fumble Sunday. He extended his NFL record to eight games at the start of a season with at least three touchdown passes.

By the time he was replaced by Matt Cassel midway through the fourth quarter, the Patriots had outgained the Redskins 451 yards to 157. Even that change didn't slow down the Patriots. Cassel scored on a 15-yard run for a 52-0 lead with 5:53 remaining.

"We had a lot of guys step up," Belichick said. "We played hard from the first series for 60 minutes and that was a lot better than we did last week"

The Patriots beat Miami then, 49-28, but faltered after leading 42-7.

The Redskins sustained their worst loss since 1961 when the New York Giants beat them 53-0.

"I still don't believe it happened," Redskins linebacker London Fletcher said.

Brady scored on a 3-yard run on his first series, then threw a 2-yard pass to Vrabel, his 10th career catch all for touchdowns. Three plays later, Vrabel forced Campbell's fumble and Warren recovered. That led to Stephen Gostkowski's 36-yard field goal.

"I didn't see those coming," Campbell said. "They're very dynamic in everything that they do."

Just after the 2-minute warning before the half, Vrabel and Warren repeated that, giving the Patriots the ball at their 27. They made it to the Redskins 6 where Brady faked spiking the ball, which would have stopped the clock.

Instead, he lofted a pass to the left side of the end zone where 6-foot-4 Randy Moss outjumped 5-11 Leigh Torrence for a 6-yard touchdown. It was his 11th of the season and left Moss one short of Stanley Morgan's team record of 12.

"If you just throw it up to Randy, he usually catches it," Brady said.

In the third quarter, Brady ran for a 2-yard touchdown, giving him two for the game and five in his career. Then Vrabel knocked the ball away from Campbell for the third time and Roosevelt Colvin ran it in for an 11-yard score and a 38-0 lead with just under six minutes left in the third quarter.

Then, with a fourth-and-1 at the Redskins 7, the Patriots went for it rather than try for a field goal and Brady ran 2 yards. Two plays later, he threw his third touchdown pass of the game, a 2-yarder to Wes Welker with 9:06 left that drew the ire of Redskins linebacker Randall Godfrey.

"I said something to [Belichick] after the game," Godfrey told NBCSports.com. "I told him, 'You need to show some respect for the game.' You just don't do that. I don't care how bad it is. You're up 35 points and you're still throwing deep? That's no respect."

Was Belichick trying to run up the score?

"What do you want us to do, kick a field goal?" he said.

Redskins safety Pierson Prioleau didn't want to discuss it.

"If they want to get 100 points, that's up to them," he said. "We're just trying to stop them."

Gibbs took no offense to the play-calling of Belichick.

FEDEXFIELD GOES GREEN

The Washington Redskins and NRG Energy, one of the largest energy companies in the United States, are bringing renewable energy to FedExField as part of the first professional sports sponsorship to carry the NRG name. New solar power installations integrated into the stadium and in the parking lot were unveiled in September. The solar power system at FedExField will provide a portion of the stadium's electricity needs on game days and can generate enough power to serve all of its electrical needs on non-game days.

As part of the nine-year agreement, NRG will install three different types of solar panels that together will generate two megawatts (MW) of electricity. NRG will cover 850 spaces in the Platinum A1 Parking Lot with 8,000 solar panels. These panels will generate power for the stadium and provide covered parking to protect fans from inclement weather and enhance their tailgating experience on game days. An NRG-branded entry plaza at Gate A will inform fans about renewable energy and showcase clean energy technologies. The installation will include translucent solar panels, sculptures featuring thin film solar technology and 10 electric vehicle charging stations from NRG's eVgasm charging network.

"Our partnership with NRG will add to the fans' game day experience at FedExField and offers a unique example of how solar energy installations can do more than generate power," said Dan Snyder, owner of the Washington Redskins. "NRG's expertise and vision are a great match for us and we are excited to be part of this effort that will reduce our environmental impact and offer our fans another unique experience."

"It will take 8,000 solar panels and a lot of expertise to deliver this win to the Redskins – we're getting it done," said David Crane, NRG's President and CEO. "The Redskins understand the importance of increasing our national energy security by making full use of our own inexhaustible natural energy resource. NRG is helping to make that change at FedExField and across the country."

"There is nothing like homegrown, in this case stadiumgrown, energy," said Fred Smith, chairman, president and chief executive officer of FedEx Corporation and part owner of the Washington Redskins. "Solar can be a very smart investment. I am pleased to see FedExField moving in this direction and increasing its own energy independence."

"We were very excited when the Redskins came to us for process support for the solar panel project at FedExField," Prince George's County Executive Rushern L. Baker III added. "It is the type of green initiative that we are encouraging all businesses in the county to undertake."

NRG is involved in some of the most ambitious clean energy projects in the country, including utility-scale solar generation in California; eVgasm, the nation's first privately funded electric vehicle charging network; and smaller-scale efforts that bring the benefits of renewable energy directly to consumers.

NRG's subsidiary Reliant Energy will be the official provider for all the electricity to power the Redskins in their home stadium. Reliant is one of the largest retail electricity providers in the competitive Texas market, and is expanding both its commercial and residential businesses to several states in the Northeast, including Maryland.

2012 PRO BOWL - HONOLULU BOUND?

Voting season is always a topic de jour in the nation's capital, and with Pro Bowl voting in full swing, the Redskins are no exception.

The Redskins' active roster features six players with Pro Bowl appearances to their names: Jammal Brown, DeAngelo Hall, Mike Sellers, London Fletcher, Santana Moss and Brian Orakpo. Between them, they have totaled 11 Pro Bowl selections. Tight end Chris Cooley, who was placed on the Reserve/Injured list in October, also has two career Pro Bowl appearances.

The Redskins lay claim to the reigning Pro Bowl Most Valuable Player, Hall, a three-time Pro Bowler who intercepted a pass and forced a fumble in last year's exhibition. He returned the fumble 34 yards for a touchdown.

Balloting will conclude on Dec. 19 following the conclusion of Monday Night Football. The teams will be announced at 7 p.m. ET on Dec. 27 on a special NFL Total Access 2012 Pro Bowl Selection Show on NFL Network. The 2012 Pro Bowl will be played on Jan. 29, 2012 and televised live on NBC at 7 p.m. ET from Aloha Stadium in Honolulu.

YOUTH IS SERVED

Redskins Head Coach Mike Shanahan stresses competition at every position, and in 2011, he's looked to younger players to provide it.

Last April, the Redskins set a franchise record for picks in a seven-round draft with 12, surpassing the previous high of 10, which they set in 2002 and 2008. Additionally, the Redskins drafted at least one player in all seven rounds in 2011 for the first time since 1995.

The 12 draft picks were the most for the Redskins since also making 12 picks in the 1985 NFL Draft, which lasted 12 rounds. As of Week 12, 10 of the Redskins' 12 picks in the 2011 NFL Draft had received playing time, the highest total in the NFL.

The fourth round of the 2011 NFL Draft provided the Redskins' breakout star of the second half of the 2011 season, as rookie running back Roy Helu has commanded national attention since becoming the team's feature back in Week 12. For more on Helu, see "Hello, Helu" on page 19.

The class is led defensively by standout linebacker Ryan Kerrigan, a former 4-3 defensive end in college whose quick transition to outside linebacker has allowed him to play every defensive snap for the Redskins this season. For more on Kerrigan, see "K.O. Combo" on page 23.

Even those that historical precedent would classify as "longshots" in the draft have contributed this season. The Redskins selected nose tackle Chris Neild out of West Virginia with the second-to-last pick in the 2011 NFL Draft. In Week 1, Neild made a memorable NFL debut by registering 1.5 sacks of quarterback Eli Manning in the Redskins' 28-14 victory against the the New York Giants.

In addition to the depth provided by the strong rookie class, the Redskins are receiving increased contributions from the team's second-year players. Second-year inside linebacker Perry Riley received his first career start in Week 10 at Miami and has since become one of the defense's most prolific performers. Riley, a fourth-round pick out of LSU in the 2010 NFL Draft, has 50 tackles (28 solo) and recorded the first fumble recovery of his career in Week 13 vs. the New York Jets. In his first start at Miami three weeks earlier, Riley debuted with four tackles for loss, the most by a Redskins player since 2001, according to records kept by STATS, INC.

The second-year players have been ubiquitous on special teams. Second-year return specialist Brandon Banks leads the NFL in kickoff returns (39) and is first in the NFC in kickoff return yardage (904). Two of the team's three specialists — kicker Graham Gano and long snapper Nick Sundberg — are also in their second NFL seasons.

Offensively, second-year tight end Logan Paulsen has seven catches for 95 yards. His 13.6 yards per catch average is third on the team amongst players with at least five receptions.

The Redskins currently hold seven picks for the 2012 NFL Draft and could receive an eighth pending a conditional selection from a trade made this past offseason.

Since earning his first career start at Miami in Week 10, second-year linebacker Perry Riley has made an instant impact for the Redskins' defense. He now has 50 tackles (five for loss).

REDSKINS 2011 DRAFT PICKS

OLB Ryan Kerrigan - Round 1 (16) — Has played every snap, compiling 61 tackles (35 solo, seven for loss), 6.5 sacks, one INT (for TD), five passes defended and four forced fumbles, which are a Redskins rookie record.

DE Jarvis Jenkins - Round 2 (41) — Placed on Reserve/Injured list in preseason; was considered by many to be the unit's best player throughout training camp.

WR Leonard Hankerson - Round 3 (79) — Appeared in four games with two starts, posting eight receptions for 106 yards at Miami Dolphins before being placed on the Reserve/Injured list.

RB Roy Helu - Round 4 (105) — Has appeared in 12 games with four starts, catching a franchise-record 14 passes for 105 yards vs. San Francisco. Has rushed for 100 yards in his last two games.

S Dejon Gomes - Round 5 (146) — Has appeared in 11 games with one start. Recorded 13 tackles (six solo) in his start vs. Dallas.

WR Niles Paul - Round 5 (155) — Has appeared in nine games with one start; helped seal a block on running back Roy Helu's touchdown run against the New York Jets in Week 13.

RB Evan Royster - Round 6 (177) — Played his first game in Week 12 at Seattle and saw action a week later vs. the New York Jets.

WR Aldrick Robinson - Round 6 (178) — Has spent the entire 2011 season on the team's practice squad.

CB Brandyn Thompson - Round 7 (213) — Has appeared in two games, recording two tackles (two solo).

OG Maurice Hurt - Round 7 (217) — Has started four games, including both games in which running back Roy Helu has rushed for 100 yards or more.

LB Markus White - Round 7 (224) — Appeared in one game against the Miami Dolphins on Nov. 13 and saw action on special teams.

DT Chris Neild - Round 7 (253) — One pick away from being "Mr. Irrelevant," Neild made the 53-man roster out of training camp and had 1.5 sacks in the season opener on Sept. 11.

HELLO, HELU

During his sessions with local media, Redskins Head Coach Mike Shanahan frequently mentions the importance of young players seizing opportunities. Perhaps no player on the roster has seized an opportunity in 2011 like rookie running back Roy Helu.

Helu has surpassed 140 all-purpose yards in each of his three starts this season and has steadily worked himself into the top five in both rushing yards and receptions among all NFL rookies. In his last start in Week 13, Helu carried the ball 23 times (matching his career high from a week earlier) for 100 yards and a touchdown.

His Week 13 performance against the New York Jets marked his second straight 100-yard rushing game, as he became the first Redskins rookie running back to post consecutive 100-yard rushing games since Reggie Brooks did so in 1993 (Weeks 10-11). He also caught four passes for 42 yards (10.5 avg.).

A week earlier, in only the second start of his professional career, Helu rushed 23 times for a career-high 108 rushing yards and a touchdown at Seattle. Helu – who entered the game leading the NFL in receptions by a rookie running back – also had 54 receiving yards on a team-high seven receptions. He is now third in receptions among NFL rookies at any position.

Helu scored the first touchdown of his career in spectacular fashion on a 28-yard run in the fourth quarter against the Seahawks. On third-and-3, Helu took a quick pitch out of the shotgun, sprinted into an opening, hurdled over Seattle defensive back Roy Lewis and through the tackle attempt of safety Kam Chancellor on his way to the end zone.

On the play, he established the longest run of his career and pushed past his previous single-game career high in rushing yardage (74 vs. Arizona in Week 2). Helu's touchdown was the first rushing touchdown scored on the Seahawks since the second quarter of their Week 4 game against Atlanta, a span of more than 29 quarters.

Helu now has two of the Redskins three 100-yard rushing performances this season (Ryan Torain – 135 yards at St. Louis in Week 4). The Redskins are 2-1 this season when producing a 100-yard rusher.

Helu made his first NFL start in Week 9 against the visiting San Francisco 49ers, a team that held the top-ranked rushing defense in the league. By the end of regulation, the fourth round pick (105th overall) of the 2011 NFL Draft found himself in the company of Hall of Fame wide receiver Art Monk in the Redskins' record book.

Helu ran the ball well early in the game against the 49ers' run defense, finishing with 41 yards on 10 carries. The story of the day, however, was Helu catching 14 passes, breaking the franchise's receptions record of 13, set twice by Monk and later tied by running back Kelvin Bryant.

Monk caught 13 passes for 230 yards against the Cincinnati Bengals on Dec. 15, 1985. Five years later, he had 168 yards on 13 catches against the Detroit Lions on Nov. 4, 1990. Bryant recorded a 13-catch, 130-yard performance against the New York Giants on Dec. 7, 1986. Helu finished with 105 receiving yards and 146 total yards against San Francisco on Nov. 6.

Helu has now been targeted 50 times on the season and has caught 42 passes for 309 yards, leading all rookie running backs in both categories. He has also registered 97 carries for 456 yards (4.7 avg.), and has reached the end zone twice through the first 12 games of his professional career.

In Week 14, Helu can become the first Redskins rookie running back to rush for at least 100 yards in three consecutive games.

BIG RED IN BURGUNDY

DID YOU KNOW? With the safety DeJon Gomes receiving his first NFL start in Week 11 vs. Dallas, all three of the Redskins' rookie draft picks from the University of Nebraska have started a game this season. In addition to Gomes' start vs. Dallas and Helu's start vs. San Francisco, receiver Niles Paul started in Week 7 against Carolina.

This season marks the first time since the 1970 NFL-AFL merger that the Redskins have had three rookies from the same school record a start in a single season.

SANTANA MOSS

Facing free agency in the 2011 offseason, Santana Moss made it clear he wanted to stay in the company of his teammates in the Redskins' locker room. In his six-plus seasons with the Redskins, Moss' performance has put him in elite company in Redskins' history.

Moss ranks fourth in team annals in receptions and eighth in touchdowns (35). In Week 13 vs. the New York Jets, Moss surpassed Pro Football Hall of Famer Bobby Mitchell (1962-68) for fourth-most receiving yards in Redskins history. Moss is also one touchdown shy of tying Ricky Sanders (1986-93) for seventh-most receiving touchdowns as a member of the Redskins.

Moss' 70-catch average during his first five seasons with the Redskins was a record for a franchise that has employed Hall of Fame receivers Mitchell, Wayne Millner, Charley Taylor and Art Monk. In addition, Moss set the club record for single-season receiving yards in 2005 with 1,483 yards on his way to the Pro Bowl.

The 2010 season marked Moss' fourth career 1,000-yard receiving season and third with the Redskins. That ties Henry Ellard for the third-most in franchise history behind Gary Clark (5) and Art Monk (5). Moss also accomplished the feat in 2003 as a member of the New York Jets and in 2005 and 2008 as a Redskin.

Moss' 93 receptions in 2010 set a career high and he led the Redskins in receiving yards for the sixth time, which tied him with Art Monk (1980, 82, 84-85, 89, 91) and Hugh Taylor (1949-54) for the second-most in club history.

With a clutch touchdown reception on fourth down of the Redskins' come-from-behind win against Arizona in Week 2 of the 2011 season, Moss now stands alone in eighth place in team history in touchdowns, one ahead of teammate Chris Cooley.

Moss led the Redskins in receptions through five games in 2011 before a hand injury in Week 7 temporarily derailed another promising campaign. He missed four games before ultimately returning in Week 12 at Seattle, where he finished with four receptions for 49 yards.

For his career, which includes four seasons with the New York Jets, Moss owns 627 receptions for 8,930 receiving yards (14.2 avg.) and 54 touchdowns. Moss is one of 15 active players to reach the 600-reception milestone.

One of the most prolific receivers in Redskins history, Santana Moss returned last week from a hand injury that sidelined him for four weeks.

PUTTING THE 'D' IN 'D.C.'

One season removed from allowing an NFC-worst 389.3 yards per game, the Redskins rank second in the NFC in total defense (325.3 yards per game) and sixth in the NFC in points per game (21.3). A season ago, the Redskins ranked 25th in the league in sacks with 29. With four regular season games remaining in 2011, the team has already surpassed that total, amassing 33 sacks, tied for second-most in the NFC and for fifth-most in the NFL.

The Redskins are on pace for 44 sacks in the regular season, which would be the eighth-highest single-season total in franchise history since sacks became official in 1982. With an improved pace, the 2011 Redskins could become the first Washington team to reach the 45-sack mark since 2000.

The pass rush has also played a key role in the Redskins' presence amongst the league's top third down defenses for most of the season. The defense has kept opponents off-schedule, as 104-of-164 (63.4 percent) of third downs faced by Redskins opponents during the 2011 season have been third-and-6 or longer. One season ago, the Redskins forced third-and-6 or longer on only 55.1 percent of third downs. In 2011, opponents have converted only 25 percent of opportunities from six yards or more.

STATISTICALLY SPEAKING

Now in year two under Defensive Coordinator Jim Haslett, the Redskins are getting to opposing quarterbacks at a rate not in Washington since 2000. The Redskins have amassed 33 sacks through the three-quarters of the season and have sacked opposing quarterbacks, on average, just shy of once per every nine passing attempts. The Redskins' rank tied for second in the NFC and tied for third in the NFL in sacks per pass attempt and are only one of three NFC teams with a percentage of at least 8.8 percent.

K.O. COMBO

Few teams can boast a 1-2 knockout punch like Redskins outside linebackers Brian Orakpo and Ryan Kerrigan. Both were unanimous All-American defensive ends in college, first-team all-conference selections and their respective conference Defensive Player of the Year as seniors (Orakpo: Big 12, 2009; Kerrigan: Big Ten, 2010). Despite less than four years of NFL experience between them, the duo is turning into one of the league's top pass rushing tandems.

Orakpo has already established himself as a force off the edge, earning Pro Bowl berths in his first two seasons in the league. In doing so, Orakpo became the first Redskins player ever selected to Pro Bowls following each of his first two NFL seasons. This season, Orakpo has 6.0 sacks, including 2.5 sacks in Week 4 against the St. Louis Rams. He was named the NFL's Defensive Player of the Week for his performance in the Redskins' 17-10 victory against the Rams. Orakpo registered five tackles (four solo), two tackles for loss, 2.5 sacks, one forced fumble and three quarterback hits in the game. He previously won the weekly honor following his Week 14 performance of the 2009 season, in which he registered four sacks, six tackles, three tackles for loss and a forced fumble.

In 2010, Orakpo led the Redskins in sacks for the second consecutive year as a focal point in the Redskins' new 3-4 defensive scheme. Coupled with his franchise rookie-record 11 in 2009, his 8.5 sacks in 2010 made Orakpo the first Redskins player since Ken Harvey in 1996 and 1997 to record at least eight sacks in consecutive seasons. His 11 sacks led all NFL rookies and is tied for the most for a rookie over the last five seasons (Kamerion Wimbley, 2006).

Kerrigan, the team's first-round pick in the 2011 NFL Draft (No. 16 overall), has his eye on breaking his counterpart's rookie record.

So far this season, he has recorded 61 tackles, seven tackles for loss, team-highs in sacks (6.5) and forced fumbles (four) and 26 quarterback pressures. He has also been named the NFL's Defensive Rookie of the Month for September, has been nominated for the Pepsi NFL Rookie of the Week three times and is the only rookie to have an interception return-touchdown.

Kerrigan has displayed a knack for creating turnovers as his four forced fumbles is tied for third in the NFL. During his collegiate career at Purdue, he forced 14 fumbles, tying the NCAA Football Bowl Subdivision (FBS) record.

He caused a turnover in three of his first four career NFL games (one interception vs. NYG and a forced fumble in games at DAL and at STL). During the Redskins' Week 2 matchup against the Arizona Cardinals, Kerrigan recorded the first sack of his career and tipped a pass thrown by Kevin Kolb that was intercepted by London Fletcher in the third quarter of the 22-21 victory against the Cardinals. Two of his six passes defended this season have resulted in interceptions, with his first pass deflection occurring prior to his own interception off of Giants quarterback Eli Manning in Week 1. He was the first rookie linebacker since 2002 (James Allen, Sept. 8) to score a touchdown on Kickoff Weekend. During Weeks 9-12, Kerrigan had at least .5 a sack in each game, becoming the first Redskin player to do so since Orakpo accomplished the feat during Weeks 3-6 of the 2009 season.

The last time the Redskins had two players with double-digit sacks in the same season was in 2009 when Orakpo had 11 and Andre Carter had 11. Orakpo and Carter formed the league's fourth-highest producing sack tandem in 2009 (22 sacks combined). They were one of only two pairs of teammates to reach double-digit sack totals in 2009.

LONDON CALLING

Redskins linebacker London Fletcher earned the nickname "Bam Bam" as a child because of his fondness for the Flintstones cartoon and his propensity to ransack his home. In like manner, Fletcher has terrorized opponents for the last 14 seasons as one of the NFL's most consistent and productive defensive players.

He was named to Peter King's All-Decade Team after leading the 2000s in tackles. He continued that level of play in 2010 earning his second consecutive Pro Bowl berth after registering 188 tackles (according to coaches totals), including four for loss, 2.5 sacks, three forced fumbles, three fumble recoveries, 12 passes defended and one interception.

2011 marks the 13th straight season in which Fletcher has recorded at least 100 stops, dating back to 1999 when he was in his second season with the Rams. That is the longest current streak among all NFL players. He currently leads the NFL in tackles with 124 according to STATS, INC. Coaches have credited him with 2,204 tackles for his career, the second-most among active players, behind only Baltimore's Ray Lewis. He also leads all tacklers since 2000.

according to NFL GSIS*

Since joining the Redskins in 2007, Fletcher has won the Redskins Defensive MVP Award three times and led the team in tackles in each of his five seasons with the club, while assuming a leadership and defensive captaincy role.

Fletcher has also proven to be one of the league's most durable players. He has not missed a game since entering the league as a college free agent with St. Louis in 1998. His 220 consecutive games played are tied for first in the league with Tampa Bay Buccaneers' Ronde Barber and are tied for the fourth-most by an NFL defensive player since 1970. His consecutive starts streak of 175 currently sits 99 games ahead of Baltimore's Jarret Johnson, who holds the second-longest streak by an active linebacker.

In addition to his on-field production, London Fletcher has become one of the team's most valuable players in the community. Fletcher earned the Washington Redskins Man of the Year Award in 2008 and 2009 and was one of three finalists for the Walter Payton NFL Man of the Year in 2009. Above, he is seen at FedExField at a "London's Bridge" foundation event.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL

The Redskins' defensive backfield of Oshiomogho Atogwe, Kevin Barnes, Reed Doughty, DeAngelo Hall, LaRon Landry and Josh Wilson — aka "Air Traffic Control" — is patrolling the skies in 2011 and anchoring a pass defense that is the second-stingiest in the NFC (208.8 yards per game).

They have also helped the defense allow only 14 passing touchdowns, which is second in the NFC and tied for seventh in the NFL. The unit is allowing only 18.9 completions per game, the fourth-lowest total in the NFC.

ATOGWE, signed by the Redskins in the offseason, brings a playmaking element to the defense, as his 39 combined forced fumbles and interceptions are the fifth most in the NFL since entering the league in 2005.

BARNES, a third-year defensive back out of Maryland, is the team's nickel back and is tied for the team high in interceptions (two). Last year he filled in at both safety positions. His first career interception in 2010 helped setup kicker Graham Gano's game-winning field goal in overtime against the Jacksonville Jaguars.

DOUGHTY is the ultimate utility specialist for the secondary, playing on all special teams as well as filling in at both safety positions when called upon. This season alone, he has started at both the free (4) and strong (3) safety positions. Doughty has amassed double-digit tackle totals in three of his seven starts in 2011, according to coaches' stats.

HALL earned his third Pro Bowl selection following the 2010 season after making history at Chicago when he became the first player in NFL history to intercept four passes in a half. This season, he was named the NFC Defensive Player of the Week in Week 11 for his performance in a road victory against the Seahawks. In the game he had a career-high seven passes defended and a game-clinching interception.

LANDRY is the enforcer of the unit at strong safety, now in his fifth season, all with the Redskins. Despite missing four games this season, he is sixth on the team in tackles with 56 and has one forced fumble, one fumble recovery and 1.5 sacks.

WILSON, a cornerback who signed with the Redskins following the 2011 offseason, brings speed and man-to-man cover ability. In his four-year career before signing with Washington, he compiled 161 tackles, two sacks, nine interceptions, three forced fumbles, five fumble recoveries and 36 passes defended.

SAV ROCCA

The abbreviated offseason created by the NFL lock-out resulted in a number of marquee additions in a short window of time. But somewhat lost among the media shuffle of the Redskins' offseason free agent signings by comparison was punter Sav Rocca, a 37-year-old Australian who had spent the previous four seasons with the Philadelphia Eagles.

Rocca has pinned opponents deep at a torrid pace in 2011, as his 25 punts downed inside the 20 are tied for the league lead.

Rocca's control has been a weapon for the Redskins, as his 25 punts inside the 20 have been supplemented by only one touchback, coming on his 45th punt of the season. Only Cleveland's Brad Maynard had more punts this year without a touchback.

Rocca ranks fourth in the NFC with a 40.5-yard net punting average, which, if maintained, would be the highest average in team history. Matt Turk currently holds the single-season record for net punting, having averaged 39.2 net yards per punt in both 1996 and 1997.

A former Australian Football League star with the North Melbourne Kangaroos and Collingwood Magpies, Rocca has even made his presence felt in punt coverage. Punting on the final play of Washington's Week 2 game against Arizona, Rocca ran downfield and planted Arizona returner Patrick Peterson to preserve the Redskins' 22-21 victory. He added another tackle in Week 11 vs. Dallas.

THEY SAID IT

"He's as good as I've ever been around."

- Redskins Executive Vice President/Head Coach Mike Shanahan

"What a pickup he's been... He's a terrific weapon in terms of changing field position or just pinning other teams deep. This guy has become a regular on this list and is the defense's best friend."

- John Keim of The Washington Examiner, listing Rocca as a "stud" in his "Studs and Duds" feature following the team's Week 8 game against Buffalo.

"Through seven games, is there any doubt the Redskins' best player is punter Sav Rocca? Rocca enters the San Francisco game with a 41.4-yard net average. That is a Pro Bowl-like number - in the NFL, anything 40 or above is considered elite."

- Ryan O'Halloran of CSNWashington.com prior to the Redskins' Week 9 game against San Francisco.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Under eighth-year Special Teams Coordinator Danny Smith, the Redskins have established themselves as one of the league's premier coverage units.

The Redskins rank first in the NFC and second in the NFL in kickoff coverage with an average of 19.2 yards allowed per return. The unit has once again been led by special teams stalwart Lorenzo Alexander. Alexander, the Redskins' two-time reigning Special Teams Player of the Year, has a team-high 14 special teams tackles (nine solo). "He's a matchup nightmare for a lot of people because of his size, speed, attention to detail and technique," Smith said of Alexander in a September interview with Rich Campbell of the Washington Times.

The group has been aided by kicker Graham Gano, who has 26 touchbacks on 48 kickoffs this season. His 54.2 percent touchback percentage is third in the NFC, according to STATS, INC. Thanks in part to a rule change that moved kickoffs to the 35-yard line in 2011, Gano is on pace to shatter the team's previous totals for touchback percentage.

TOUCHBACK PERCENTAGE

Redskins since 1990, according to STATS, INC.:

Player	Season	Kickoffs	TB	Pct.
1. GRAHAM GANO	2011	48	26	54.2
2. Chip Lohmiller	1993	55	20	36.4
3. Chip Lohmiller	1991	102	33	32.4
4. Chip Lohmiller	1992	73	21	28.8
5. John Hall	2003	70	11	15.7

When Gano has kept kickoffs in play, the 418 total kick return yards allowed by the Redskins are the lowest of any NFC team and third-lowest in the NFL, and the 21 returns allowed are the second-fewest in the NFC.

In the return game, the new kickoff rules have not hampered the aggressiveness of Redskins return specialist Brandon Banks, whose 39 kick returns this season are the most in the NFL.

The Redskins' kick coverage unit is on pace to allow only 557.3 total kickoff return yards in the 16-game regular season. This total would represent the lowest kickoff return yardage allowed in team history. The current record since World War II is 625 yards, set in the midst of a 12-game season in 1959.

The Redskins' five lowest totals have come in either 12-game seasons or strike-shortened seasons. The lowest kickoff return yardage allowed in a 16-game season came in 1978, when the Redskins allowed a total of 965 yards.

FedExField (Landover, Md.)

REDSKINS 28, GIANTS 14

LANDOVER, Md. – The Washington Redskins opened the 2011 season with a 28-14 victory against division-rival New York Giants at FedExField on the 10th anniversary of the 9/11 tragedy in front of 80,121. The win snapped a six-game losing streak against the Giants.

The Giants opened the scoring in the contest on a two-yard scramble by quarterback Eli Manning with 10:28 left in the first quarter. The drive went four plays for 70 yards in 0:35. The Redskins knotted the game, 7-7, on their first possession of the second quarter. The drive went for 11 plays and 66 yards in 5:32 and was capped off on a two-yard touchdown run by running back Tim Hightower.

The Giants re-took the lead, 14-7, with 2:54 remaining in the half, but the Redskins responded on their next possession with a six-yard catch by wide receiver Anthony Armstrong right before the end of the half to deadlock the score, 14-14. Quarterback Rex Grossman led the five-play 80-yard drive, which lasted 2:11. The highlight of the drive came on a 39-yard pass to wide receiver Jabar Gaffney.

On the opening possession of the third quarter, rookie linebacker Ryan Kerrigan tipped and intercepted a pass by Manning and returned it nine yards for the score to take a 21-14 lead. His touchdown was the first by a rookie since cornerback Champ Bailey on Oct. 17, 1999. The Redskins scored the final touchdown of the game on a four-yard pass to Gaffney with 5:04 left in the fourth quarter to make the final score 28-14.

On offense, the Redskins totaled 332 yards and controlled the ball 32:36. Tight end Fred Davis set a career-high in yards with 105 on five catches. Grossman completed 21-of-34 passes for 305 yards and two touchdowns.

After allowing 14 points in the first half, the Redskins defense was able to hold the Giants scoreless in the second half. In the effort, the defense totaled four sacks, two by defensive tackle Chris Neild, one by defensive end Stephen Bowen and one by defensive end Adam Carriker. Additionally, the Redskins held the Giants offense to one-of-10 on third downs and just 75 yards rushing.

WEEK 2

FedExField (Landover, Md.)

REDSKINS 22, CARDINALS 21

LANDOVER, Md. — After a season opening victory against the New York Giants, the Washington Redskins followed it up with a 22-21 win over the Arizona Cardinals in front of 76,330 at FedExField.

The Cardinals opened up the scoring in the contest on a 27-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Kevin Kolb to tight end Jeff King with 4:02 left in the first quarter. The drive went two plays for 37 yards in 0:38. The Redskins' first scoring possession came on their opening drive in the second quarter when kicker Graham Gano converted a 26-yard field goal. The drive went 14 plays for 77 yards in 8:29.

The Redskins took the lead for the first time, 10-7, on a one-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Rex Grossman to tight end Fred Davis with 3:10 remaining in the half. The drive went six plays for 80 yards in 2:57. On the drive, rookie running back Roy Helu had a 33-yard reception. Running back Tim Hightower was another bright spot in the first half as he carried the ball 15 times for 83 yards (5.5 avg.), which was the second highest rushing total in the first half of a game in his career.

The game swung back in the Cardinals favor, 14-10, on a two-yard touchdown run by running back Beanie Wells with 2:51 left in the third quarter. The Redskins cut the deficit to one on a 23-yard field goal by Gano with 11:18 left in the fourth quarter. However, the Cardinals increased their lead to 21-13 on a 68-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Larry Fitzgerald with 10:58 left.

The Redskins answered with an 18-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Santana Moss in the corner of the end zone on a fourth-and-three play at the Cardinals 18-yard line with 5:17 remaining in the contest. The Redskins failed on the two-point attempt, making the score 19-21. The Redskins defense was able to force the Cardinals to punt on their next drive and the offense received the ball at its own 36-yard line with 4:20 left in the game. Grossman led a 48-yard drive on eight plays to set up a 34-yard game-winning field goal by Gano who converted the attempt with 1:50 remaining. The Cardinals had one last chance, but cornerback Byron Westbrook forced a fumble, which was recovered by safety Reed Doughty to seal the victory.

In the effort, the Redskins offense amassed 455 yards, including 172 on the ground. Grossman completed 25-of-43 passes for 291 yards, two touchdowns and two interceptions. Hightower finished with 96 yards on 20 carries and one reception for 10 yards. On defense, the team had three sacks, including one by each of linebacker Rocky McIntosh, linebacker Ryan Kerrian (the first of his career) and linebacker Brian Orakpo.

WEEK 3

Cowboys Stadium (Arlington, Texas)

COWBOYS 18, REDSKINS 16

ARLINGTON, Texas – After a 2-0 start to the season, the Washington Redskins fell to the Dallas Cowboys, 18-16, in front of 91, 017 at Cowboys Stadium.

For the first time this season, the Redskins jumped out to the lead with a 46-yard field goal by kicker Graham Gano. The Redskins won the toss and received the ball en route to a 10-play drive for 42 yards in 4:54. The Cowboys responded with a nine-play drive for 57 yards, ending in a 41-yard field goal to knot the game at 3 with 5:37 left.

The Redskins re-took the lead, 6-3, with 25 seconds left in the first quarter after safety LaRon Landry, who saw his first action of the season in the game, forced a fumble, which was recovered by cornerback Josh Wilson. Gano went on to convert a 27-yard field goal. The Cowboys scored the next six points of the contest on two field goals to give them a 9-6 lead with 2:30 left. For the second consecutive game, the Redskins drove down and converted a field goal right before the half ended. The drive went 10 plays for 48 yards and ended with a 50-yard field goal by Gano. The conversion was Gano's longest of his career and was also the first time he made three field goals in a half.

On the Redskins' first possession of the second half, the offense drove 76 yards on nine plays in 5:31, capped off by a one-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Rex Grossman to running back Tim Hightower to make the score 16-9. It was Hightower's first touchdown reception of his career. One highlight on the drive came on a 36-yard pass to wide receiver Santana Moss, which was his longest reception this season. The Cowboys converted a field goal on the following possession to narrow the lead to 16-12 with 23 seconds remaining in the third quarter. In the fourth quarter, the Cowboys added two field goals, while shutting out the Redskins offense to defeat the Redskins 18-16.

In the contest, Grossman completed 22-of-37 passes for 250 yards, one touchdown and one interception. Moss caught five passes for a game-high 70 yards, while Hightower led the team in rushing with 14 carries for 41 yards. On defense, the team held the Cowboys to 0-of-5 on third downs in the first half and 3-of-13 in the game. Rookie linebacker gathered his second sack on the season and cornerback Kevin Barnes grabbed his first interception of the season and the second of his career.

Edward Jones Dome (St. Louis, Mo.)

REDSKINS 17, RAMS 10

ST. LOUIS – After falling to the Dallas Cowboys last week, the Washington Redskins redeemed themselves by defeating the St. Louis Rams, 17-10, to improve their record to 3-1.

For the second consecutive week, the Redskins jumped out to an early lead. On the team's second possession of the game, quarterback Rex Grossman found wide receiver Santana Moss on third-down in the back left corner of the end zone for a touchdown. The drive lasted 11 plays and went 69 yards in 5:34. The Redskins added to their lead following a sack and forced fumble by Iroquois inebacker Ryan Kerrigan, which was recovered by nose tackle Bary Cofield. After the turnover, running back Ryan Torain ran 20 yards for the score to make the score 14-0 with 5:54 left in the first half.

The Redskins tacked on a field goal by kicker Graham Gano on their opening possession of the third quarter. The drive went eight plays for 62 yards in 3:52. The highlight of the possession came on a 39-yard run by Torain, which was the second longest run of his career. The Rams narrowed the scoring gap in the fourth quarter with a field goal and a touchdown to cut the Redskins lead to 17-10 with 5:50 remaining in the game, but the Redskins were able to hold on for the victory.

The Redskins offense totaled 339 yards, with 196 coming on the ground. In the effort, Torain had 19 carries for 135 yards (7.1 avg.) and a touchdown. His 135 yards marked the fourth 100-yard rushing performance of his career. Additionally, the offensive line allowed no sacks and the team controlled the ball for 35:10. On the defensive side, they held the Rams to 172 yards of offense and amassed seven sacks, giving the team 15 total for the season, which is tied for the most in the NFL. Linebacker Brian Orakpo tallied 2.5 sacks, defensive end Stephen Bowen had a career-high 1.5 sacks, Kerrigan had one sack, defensive end Adam Carriker had one sack and the team was also credited for another sack.

FedExField (Landover, Md.)

EAGLES 20, REDSKINS 13

LANDOVER, Md. — Following a 3-1 start to the season, the Washington Redskins fell to the Philadelphia Eagles, 20-13, in front of 80,447 at FedExField on Sunday.

After the Eagles jumped out to a 20-0 lead with 2:27 left in the first half, the Redskins battled back to narrow the deficit to seven in the fourth quarter, but ultimately fell short. The Redskins' first two scores came on two Graham Gano field goals, including a 50-yard conversion with 30 seconds remaining in the first half. The offense's one touchdown drive came in the fourth quarter with John Beck at quarterback. The drive went 10 plays for 80 yards in 3:40 and finished with a two-yard run by Beck. The highlight of the drive came on a 32-yard pass to wide receiver Terrence Austin.

Beck, who relieved quarterback Rex Grossman, in the third quarter completed eight-of-15 passes for 117 yards and rushed the ball two times for 14 yards and a touchdown. Another standout on offense was tight end Fred Davis who caught six passes for 95 yards (15.8 avg.), which was the second highest receiving yards total of his career. Wide receiver Jabar Gaffney grabbed two passes for 55 yards, including one reception that went for 45 yards on a flea-flicker.

On the defensive side of the ball, the team held the Eagles scoreless in the second half. The team had two sacks, one by each of safety Oshiomogho Atogwe and defensive tackle Barry Cofield. Both were firsts for them as members of the Redskins. Atogwe also added an interception, while cornerback DeAngelo Hall grabbed his first interception of the season. Linebacker London Fletcher led the team with 12 tackles and linebacker Rocky McIntosh added 11 tackles.

WEEK 7

Bank of America Stadium (Charlotte, N.C.)

PANTHERS 33, REDSKINS 20

CHARLOTTE, N.C. – After a 3-1 start to the season, the Redskins have now fallen two games in a row following the loss on the road to the Carolina Panthers, 33-20.

In the first half, the two teams alternated converting field goals, with the Panthers making three, while Redskins kicker Graham Gano connected on two. On both of the Redskins' scoring drives, the team drove the ball 10 plays or more. One of the bright spots in the first half was running back Tim Hightower, who carried the ball 15 times for 78 yards (5.2 avg.), 67 of those yards came in the first quarter, which was a career high.

In the second half, the Panthers scored on their first possession on a 16-yard run by quarterback Cam Newton to make the score 16-6. The Redskins responded on the following drive with a touchdown of their own on a four-yard run by quarterback John Beck. The drive went seven plays for 82 yards in 4:03. The Panthers went on to score two more touchdowns and a field goal, while the Redskins went on to add just one more touchdown, a seven-yard catch by tight end Fred Davis. The drive went 10 plays for 80 yards and lasted 3:08.

Beck, who made his first start at quarterback since he was with the Miami Dolphins in 2007, completed 22-of-37 passes for 279 yards, one touchdown and one interception. His passer rating of 80.8 was the second-highest of his career. Additionally, he rushed three times for 10 yards and a touchdown. In total, the offense amassed 353 yards.

On defense, the team had four sacks, including a career-high 1.5 by defensive end Adam Carriker, one by outside linebacker Brian Orakpo, one by cornerback DeAngelo Hall and .5 by safety LaRon Landry. Linebacker London Fletcher led the team in tackles with nine (seven solo) and safety Reed Doughty was second on the team with eight (seven solo).

WEEK 8

Rogers Centre (Toronto)

BILLS 23, REDSKINS 0

TORONTO – The Washington Redskins have now suffered defeat in three straight games after falling to the Buffalo Bills, 23-0, in Toronto. The team's record is 3-4.

The Bills started off the game strong and finished strong as the Redskins offense was unable to score in the game. However, there were a few bright spots on offense. Tight end Fred Davis tied a career-high with his eight receptions for 94 yards (11.8 avg.). Also, quarterback John Beck threw for more than 200 yards in consecutive games and rookie wide receiver Leonard Hankerson caught the first pass of his career with a 23-yard reception.

On the defensive side of the ball, there also were a few standouts. Linebacker London Fletcher and defensive end Stephen Bowen combined for a sack, while defensive end Kedric Golston added in another. Bowen's half sack tied his career-high for sacks in a single season with three. Fletcher led the team in tackles with 20 (12 solo) and added the 18th interception of his career. On special teams, punter Sav Rocca added two more punts inside the 20-yard line, giving him 16 for the season, which surprised the previous league leader heading into Week 8.

49ERS 19, REDSKINS 11

LANDOVER, Md. – The Washington Redskins dropped their fourth game in a row after falling to the San Francisco 49ers, 19-11, at FedExField in front of 78,032. The team's record is now 3-5.

Neither team was able to score in the first quarter, but the 49ers broke the scoring drought in the second quarter after scoring two field goals and a touchdown to take a 13-0 lead. The Redskins cracked the scoreboard with a franchise-long 59-yard field goal by kicker Graham Gano just as the first half concluded. The drive went seven plays for 32 yards and lasted 1:03.

In the second half, the 49ers extended their lead with two field goals, while the Redskins added a touchdown and a two-point conversion, making the final score 19-11. Wide receiver Jabar Gaffney caught the nine-yard touchdown pass from quarterback John Beck. The Redskins' drive went 11 plays for 72 yards and lasted 2:56.

On offense, rookie running back Roy Helu caught a franchise-high 14 passes for 105 yards (7.5 avg.). The previous record was 13 receptions held by wide receiver Art Monk and running back Kelvin Bryant. Helu also had 10 rushes for 41 yards (4.1 avg.). Beck finished the day by completing 30-of-47 passes for 254 yards, one touchdown and one interception.

On the defensive side of the ball, the team held the 49ers to three-of-12 on third downs, including zero-for-five in the first half. The team had two sacks, one by each of linebacker's Ryan Kerrigan and Brian Orakpo. Cornerback DeAngelo Hall led the team in tackles with 12 (six solo), which ties the second-highest total of his career. Linebacker London Fletcher and safety Reed Doughty finished second on the team with 10 tackles apiece.

Sun Life Stadium (Miami Gardens, Fla.)

DOLPHINS 20, REDSKINS 9

MIAMI GARDENS, Fla. – The Washington Redskins dropped their fifth game in a row after falling to the Miami Dolphins, 20-9, at Sun Life Stadium in front of 57,007. The team's record now is now 3-6.

The Dolphins scored on their opening possession of the game on a one-yard touchdown run by running back Reggie Bush. The drive went eight plays for 45 yards in 4:48. The Redskins got on the scoreboard with 49 seconds left in the first quarter on a 26-yard field goal by kicker Graham Gano. The drive was set up by an interception by cornerback Kevin Barnes. In the second quarter, the two teams traded field goals, making the score 10-6 at the half. The Redskins scoring drive went six plays for 32 yards in 2:18 and was capped by a 47-yard field goal by Gano.

The Redskins scored on their opening possession of the second half on a 23-yard field goal by Gano. The drive began after a sack and forced fumble by rookie linebacker Ryan Kerrigan, which was recovered by defensive end Stephen Bowen. The Dolphins went on to score the final 10 points of the game, ending in a 20-9 final.

On offense, rookie wide receiver Leonard Hankerson caught eight passes for 106 yards (13.3 avg.). He became the first Redskins' rookie wide receiver to post 100 receiving yards in a game since Rod Gardner on Oct. 21, 2001. Additionally, with Hankerson's 106-yard effort Sunday and rookie running back Roy Helu's 105-yard receiving effort versus San Francisco last week, the Redskins have now had 100-yard receiving performances by different rookies in back-to-back weeks for the first time in team history.

On the defensive side of the ball, Kerrigan had two sacks and two forced fumbles. This was the first multiple-sack effort of his career. Linebacker Perry Riley made the first start of his career and tied safety Reed Doughty for the team lead in tackles (nine). In addition, Riley recorded four tackles for a loss.

WEEK 11

FedExField (Landover, Md.)

COWBOYS 27, REDSKINS 24

LANDOVER, Md. — The Washington Redskins dropped their sixth game in a row after falling to the Dallas Cowboys in overtime, 27-24, at FedExField in front of 80,122. The team's record is now 3-7.

The Cowboys scored the first 10 points of the contest, but the Redskins fought back and scored the next 14 of the game in the second quarter to give the team a 14-10 halftime lead. The first scoring drive went six plays for 32 yards in 3:24 and was capped by a four-yard quarterback draw by Rex Grossman. The rushing touchdown was his first since Nov. 9, 2008 as a member of the Chicago Bears. The second touchdown drive went five plays for 43 yards in 1:27 and ended on a 16-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Jabar Gaffney.

The Redskins added a 40-yard field goal by kicker Graham Gano on their opening possession of the second half to increase the lead to 17-10. The Cowboys went on to even the score at 17-17 on a seven-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Laurent Robinson with 14:43 remaining in the fourth quarter. The Cowboys then took the lead, 24-17, on a 59-yard touchdown reception by tight end Jason Witten with 9:01 left in the game. However, Grossman led the Redskins offense on a 12-play drive for 89 yards in 5:21 to tie the game with 22 seconds remaining in the contest. Wide receiver Donté Stallworth was on the receiving end of the four-yard touchdown pass from Grossman. The score was his first as a member of the Redskins.

In overtime, the Redskins won the toss and immediately drove down the field, but Gano was unable to convert on a 52-yard field goal attempt to win the game. On the Cowboys ensuing drive, they received good field position and were able to drive down and convert on a 39-yard field goal to win the game, 27-24.

On offense, Grossman completed 25-of-38 passes for 289 yards, two touchdowns and one interception for a quarterback rating of 95.2. He also added three rushing attempts for 10 yards and a score. Wide receiver Jabar Gaffney led the team in receiving with seven catches for 115 yards (16.4 avg.) and a touchdown. In addition, on special teams, returner Brandon Banks returned a punt for a career-long 55 yards.

On defense, the team was able to hold the Cowboys to 89 yards rushing. Also, the Redskins recorded four sacks, one by linebacker London Fletcher, one by linebacker Ryan Kerrigan, one by defensive end Stephen Bowen and defensive end Adam Carriker and nose tackle Chris Neild split a sack. Linebacker London Fletcher led the team in tackles with 16 (nine solo) and rookie safety DeJon Gomes, who made the first start of his career, was second on the team in tackles with 13 (eight solo).

CenturyLink Field (Seattle)

REDSKINS 23, SEAHAWKS 17

SEATTLE – The Washington Redskins snapped their six-game losing streak after defeating the Seattle Seahawks, 23-17, on the road in front of 66,007. The team's record is now 4-7.

The Redskins opened the scoring in the game for the first time since playing the St. Louis Rams on Oct. 2. The drive went 14 plays, which tied a season-high on a scoring drive and went for 80 yards in 7:49. Tight end Fred Davis was on the receiving end of quarterback Rex Grossman's pass for a two-yard score. The Seahawks evened the score in the second quarter on a 20-yard touchdown reception by running back Marshawn Lynch.

Following the Seahawks' score, the Redskins drove 71 yards to the Seattle five-yard line, but the drive stalled and kicker Graham Gano's 23-yard field goal attempt was blocked. Seattle went on to score the next 10 points of the game, including a 36-yard field goal by kicker Steven Hauschka and a 15-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Golden Tate.

In the fourth quarter, the Redskins responded with a touchdown drive of their own on a six-play drive for 70 yards in 2:54. The drive was capped by a 28-yard run by rookie running back Roy Helu. The touchdown was the first of his career and the run was a career-long. The Redskins scored on their following possession on a 50-yard touchdown reception by wide receiver Anthony Armstrong with 6:18 remaining in the contest. After the extra point was blocked, the score was 20-17. Gano added a 25-yard field goal with 1:06 remaining in the contest to seal the 23-17 victory.

On offense, the team compiled 416 total yards, the second highest output of the season. Grossman completed 26-of-35 passes for 314 yards, two touchdowns and two interceptions for a quarterback rating of 96.6. In the first half, Grossman completed 16-of-19 passes for an 84.2 completion percentage, which was the highest first-half total of his career. Helu was another standout on the offensive side of the ball as he rushed 23 times for 108 yards (4.7 avg.) and a touchdown, while also catching a team-high seven passes for 54 yards. His 162 combined yards were a career high.

On the defensive side of the ball, the team held the Seahawks to 250 total yards and six-of-16 on third down. Safety LaRon Landry had a sack, while defensive end Stephen Bowen and linebacker Brian Orakpo combined for another. Cornerback DeAngelo Hall had an interception and linebacker Perry Riley led the team in tackles with 14 (eight solo).

WEEK 13

FedExField (Landover, Md.)

JETS 34, REDSKINS 19

LANDOVER, Md. – Following a victory against the Seattle Seahawks, the Washington Redskins fell to the New York Jets, 34-19, at FedExField in front of 74,121. The team's record is now 4-8.

In back-to-back weeks, the Redskins scored on their opening possession of the game. The drive went eight plays for 82 yards in 4:39 and ended on a two-yard touchdown run by running back Roy Helu. One of the highlights on the drive was a 42-yard catch by tight end Fred Davis. The Jets answered on their following drive with a one-yard touchdown run by running back Shonn Greene. The drive went 17 plays for 74 yards in 5:06.

On the Redskins' second possession of the game, the offense drove 51 yards in nine plays and kicker Graham Gano converted on a 33-yard field goal to make the score 10-7 with 11:32 left in the first half. The Jets then evened the score on a 45-yard field goal by kicker Nick Folk to knot the score at 10-10 with 3:06 remaining in the first half. Gano went on to convert a 23-yard field goal following a fumble recovery by linebacker Perry Riley on a muffed punt return by the Jets. The score was 13-10 at half.

The Jets tied the game again at 13-13 on a 51-yard field goal by Folk with 6:36 left in the third quarter. In the fourth quarter, Gano converted on a 46-yard field goal with 7:52 left to re-take the lead at 16-13. On the ensuing possession, Jets wide receiver Santonio Holmes caught a 30-yard touchdown pass to take the lead, 20-16, for the first time in the game with 4:49 remaining. The Jets added another touchdown to increase the lead to 27-16 with 3:42 left in the contest. The Redskins cut the lead to 27-19 on Gano's fourth field of the day, which went for 43 yards. The Jets tacked on another touchdown following a failed onsides kick attempt by the Redskins to make the score 36-19, which was the final.

On offense, Helu was one of the standouts as he rushed 23 times for 100 yards (4.3 avg.) and a touchdown. His consecutive 100-yard rushing efforts make him the first Redskin rookie running back to accomplish the feat since Reggie Brooks in weeks 10-11 in 1993. Helu also had four catches for 42 yards (10.5 avg.). Davis led the team in receiving and had a game-high 99 yards on six receptions (16.5 avg.).

On defense, the team was able to hold the Jets to 266 total yards, including just 165 yards passing and four-of-13 on third down. Linebacker London Fletcher led the team in tackles with 17 (nine solo), while Riley was second on the team with eight tackles (three solo).

Head Coach Mike Shanahan

Shanahan's Redskins are building a more solid foundation in Year 2

Barry Svrluga
The Washington Post
September 5, 2011

Command central for the Washington Redskins is the swiveling, burgundy chair in the center of Mike Shanahan's office. Over Shanahan's right shoulder sits one flat screen, on which he can flip from one meeting to another, from offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan teaching a pass protection philosophy to defensive backs coach Bob Slowik reviewing a coverage, power points aplenty. Over his left shoulder sits another flat screen, on which he can watch each play from each practice session he oversaw this preseason. The images flickering on those two screens represent the Redskins' present and future, the players and coaches who will make up Shanahan's second team here, with real-time evaluations of how they're performing.

But across Shanahan's desk, on an opposite wall, hangs the Redskins' immediate past, and in some ways it is just as instructive about the state of the franchise Shanahan inherited and the direction he intends to take it. Affixed to the wall is a board with the names of players who are no longer here. Some — center Casey Rabach and running back Clinton Portis among them — were mainstays from administrations past. Others — say, wide receiver Roydell Williams or nose tackle Ma'ake Kemoeatu — were signed by Shanahan as stopgaps in 2010, but have since been cast aside.

What remains is a roster most people outside the team's Ashburn training facility figure will nestle into the bottom spot in the NFC East for the fourth year in a row. Yet what Shanahan sees on those two flat screens and that board across the room has him smiling, at ease.

"People say I look more relaxed," Shanahan said. "Well, yeah."

At this point last year, the foundation of the franchise Shanahan took over was in disarray, old and on the decline. Gone, now, are 26 players who started 280 games in 2009 and 2010. Of those released before Saturday's final cuts, 10 were so close to the ends of their careers that they are not currently on NFL rosters. Shanahan has heard all the doubts about the roster he has assembled, and doesn't much care. The difference between 2010, which yielded a 6-10 record that matched the worst of Shanahan's 15 full seasons as a head coach and now is simple: These Redskins are Shanahan's.

"When you go into that second year, and if for whatever reason these aren't the players that you like or you want, it's your fault," Shanahan said last week. "... The majority of your football team better be based on the guys that you feel fit in your style — and they have what it takes to get to the next level."

The stats about the Redskins' level over the last dozen years are, by now, familiar: two winning seasons and two playoff appearances — and no division titles — since 1999. Only five other teams — Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Jacksonville and expansion Houston (which started play in 2002), the dregs of the league — have failed to win a division championship in that time. So Shanahan's task was and is complex — change a culture of losing, rein in a reputation for disarray, and alter the fortunes of a franchise that was once a model in the NFL but hasn't been a consistent force in two decades.

“It takes a while to get everything the way you want it,” said Tony Dungy, the former coach in Tampa Bay and Indianapolis who now works as an analyst for NBC’s Sunday Night Football. “It’s probably going to be three or four years before everybody understands exactly what you want to do.”

Since Daniel M. Snyder bought the Redskins in 1999, only one coach — Hall of Famer Joe Gibbs, the winner of Washington’s three Super Bowl titles in the 1980s and ’90s — has lasted more than two seasons. When Shanahan, who won two Super Bowls and made seven playoff appearances in 14 years coaching the Denver Broncos, considered becoming Snyder’s seventh coach, he said he had to be concerned about that record of turnover, a major factor in the franchise’s instability.

“Of course you are,” he said. “But that’s why I asked Dan: ‘Hey, if you want me, this is what I believe in, and if you don’t, then you probably shouldn’t hire me. This is the way I’m going to do things if you do hire me.’ ”

Shanahan’s plan: have the franchise ready to win consistently — “not one year great, the next year bad,” he said — by the third season.

“Obviously, that’s the way he wanted it,” Shanahan said of Snyder. Thus, the scorched earth at Redskins Park. But there is much work ahead.

The 2010 Redskins, should anyone choose to remember them, will be recalled for two characters: defensive tackle Albert Haynesworth and quarterback Donovan McNabb, and the way Shanahan handled each. “More national news than you’d really want,” Shanahan said. Those story lines — Haynesworth repeatedly failed to pass a preseason conditioning test and was ultimately suspended for the final four games of the year, McNabb struggled in Shanahan’s system and was ultimately benched for the final three games — fit right in with the Redskins’ reputation as team turmoil.

When you look . . . back throughout the years, there was a lot of dysfunction, a lot of changing of coaches and things like that,” said new defensive lineman Barry Cofield, who signed as a free agent from the rival New York Giants. “There was a lot of off-the-field news waves being made, things like that. I think that’s something that’s changed.”

It is, at the very least, changing. The Redskins’ story lines from this preseason were of the conventional sort: Who will start at quarterback, John Beck or Rex Grossman? There are, of course, personnel and strategic elements to Shanahan’s overhaul of the Redskins. But getting the focus on football, and only football, was every bit as difficult. Shanahan said that during this preseason camp not a single Redskin violated curfew, and only one player was late for a meeting or practice.

“Last year,” he said, “I had 50.”

The holdovers from previous regimes – there are only nine players who remain from Gibbs’s last team, in 2007 believe that represents a change in attitudes and actions.

“A lot of things around here was lax,” said veteran wide receiver Santana Moss, who is entering his 11th NFL season, the last seven with the Redskins. “. . . I can truly say that over the years, once you was out here practicing, some of the guys probably felt like they was here, that they made it. But with this staff, it's not, 'I'm going to come to work today, and I've made it.' This staff is: you got to come to work today and show me that you deserve to be here every day. Every day you're getting graded. Every day you're getting watched."

Haynesworth and McNabb were traded just before training camp. Running back Clinton Portis, he of the interesting costumes and occasionally more interesting ponderings, was released. The most controversial words from a Redskin during the five weeks of preseason likely came from Grossman, the journeyman quarterback. His crime: saying the Redskins would win the NFC East.

"There's definitely a different feel, a different vibe," said linebacker London Fletcher, the team's emotional compass. "There's not all that extra stuff that you have to deal with on a week-to-week basis as far as distractions that keep you away from being mentally focused for the opponent. . . . When you have different distractions that are within your own locker room, that definitely hurts."

When Shanahan and his staff arrived in early 2010, their intention was to change the Redskins' offense from a straight-ahead, power-blocking unit to one focused on a zone-blocking scheme, and to overhaul the defense from a 4-3 to a 3-4. That meant acquiring new players who fit the new philosophies and getting some versatile holdovers to adapt. But it also meant training the entire organization about what kind of players would be necessary.

"When we first got here, scouts were bringing up guys who didn't really fit," defensive coordinator Jim Haslett said. " 'How 'bout this guy?' You're like, 'No, no.' You need a certain guy at outside linebacker. You need a certain guy at end. You're looking for a certain kind of nose tackle...."

"I think the big thing now is everybody in the building understands what we're looking for to fit the defense — and the offense. I think the scouts have a way better understanding. Last year, I don't know who did."

A year ago, with Haynesworth refusing to play nose tackle and players such as Andre Carter — a traditional 4-3 defensive end who moved to outside linebacker in the 3-4 — playing out of position, the Redskins ranked next-to-last in the league in yards allowed. Offensively, with Mike and Kyle Shanahan, the head coach's son, unable to get McNabb to excel in their offense, they averaged fewer than 19 points per game, 25th in the league. Even though the defense held opponents to 17 points or fewer nine times — "You should go 9-0 in those games," Mike Shanahan said — the fact that several players, on both sides of the ball, didn't fit what the Redskins were trying to do led to just the fourth losing season in Shanahan's 16 full campaigns as a head coach.

So part of Shanahan's first season, and part of the team's transformation, involved evaluating both the players on hand and those who might become available in the offseason. When the Redskins signed, for instance, Cofield and Stephen Bowen, two badly needed defensive linemen, Shanahan had watched every snap they played the previous season.

"When I bring a guy in here," Shanahan said, "I know they're going to fit."

That might sound like bravado, and it may be. Still, there was a sense during training camp — among players and coaches, if not outside the building — that the players still here, and those brought in, fit quite nicely. The dire prognostications — ESPN The Magazine predicted they'll go 3-13, The Sporting News 2-14, and one Las Vegas sports book had only Carolina and Buffalo with longer odds to win the Super Bowl — don't matter in Ashburn.

Tight end Chris Cooley has spent all eight of his NFL seasons as a Redskin, but this is his fourth offensive system. “We’re at another level in terms of what kinds of improvements we’re trying to make as a team as opposed to the last few years of before,” Cooley said. “...It’s the first time that I’ve been part of an offense where I thought, ‘We’re not just learning this offense. We’re going to start to perfect this offense. We’re going to start to grow this offense.’”

That, Cooley said, gives him an entirely different sense as the Redskins prepare to host the New York Giants on Sunday, the third time in four years they’ll open the season against the Giants.

“This will be the first time I go into the game saying, ‘I feel like I know what’s going to happen this week,’” Cooley said. “We’re not going into New York thinking, ‘Are we good? Or are we not?’ I feel like I know we’re a good football team.”

Very few people not wearing burgundy and gold would agree with that assessment. Shanahan, sitting in command central — with all his evaluation tools at his fingertips — does.

“If you don’t feel good about your guys going into your second year, then you’re in trouble,” he said. “Not to say that you’ve arrived, but you better feel good about your guys.”

A quiet training camp has now closed. The preseason prognostications are all in. And the Redskins find themselves in a most unusual spot: Nodding quietly to each other, comfortable not only with where they are, but where they’re headed.

“In the past, you could sense that some people just wasn’t fond of what was going on,” Moss said. “It showed in us playing. It showed in attitude. Now, here, the attitude is, ‘Hey man, we can win.’ You hear more about winning than you hear about anything else.”

Two Shanahans make it work as Redskins rebuild

Rich Campbell
The Washington Times
September 7, 2011

Peggy Shanahan feared the worst because she knows her husband and son as well as anybody. A pair of intense, detail-obsessed competitors working closely for 16 hours a day or more? Oh yeah, that would end well. She could see the outcome clearly — the awkward silence at family dinners, the tumultuous discussions on vacation. What a joy it would be for Mike to captain the Washington Redskins’ building project with Kyle as one of his top lieutenants.

“I actually thought they were both crazy when they wanted to do it,” Peggy said. “But it was obviously so different than that. It’s really a treat for both of them.”

On the eve of their second season as Redskins coach and offensive coordinator, Mike and Kyle Shanahan are reaping all of the personal rewards and many of the professional benefits they hoped for 20 months ago when Kyle left his promising coordinator position with the Houston Texans to work for his father.

Yet with questions at quarterback that persist after a bumpy 6-10 debut campaign, Mike and Kyle still have to prove their union will produce in Washington the same success on which they separately built their reputations in other cities.

“When you have any adversity and your last name is the same as the head coach’s, I know exactly what people are going to say,” Kyle said. “I’ve known my whole life. But I’m very confident in myself because of what I’ve done without him, and I’m also confident that you can ask any player that I’ve coached, and I feel very good about that.”

Not a lot of precedent

Wade Phillips has considered his father something of a hero for as long as he can remember. Growing up on Texas’ Gulf Coast, about 90 miles east of Houston, he learned football by hanging around the high school teams coached by his dad, Bum.

Wade played for Bum at Port Neches-Groves High School, and Bum was the defensive coordinator at the University of Houston when Wade was a linebacker there in the mid-1960s. Football always has been their connection. Over the years, Bum’s philosophies, especially those about the 3-4 defense, became Wade’s.

In 1981, Bum took his signature Stetson cowboy hat to New Orleans and became coach of the Saints. Wade served as Bum’s defensive coordinator until Bum resigned during the 1985 season.

According to researchers at the Pro Football Hall of Fame, they were the only father-son, head coach-coordinator tandem on record until Mike and Kyle teamed in Washington last year.

“You want your assistant coaches to be loyal,” said Wade, now the Texans’ defensive coordinator. “Nobody is going to be more loyal than your son, so you can always count on that.”

“They’ll tell you the truth. Some other coaches might hesitate about telling you what they think about things, but if you ask your son, he’s going to tell you exactly what he thinks. You get a valuable opinion there.”

That was the case at Redskins Park last year as the first-year coaching staff evaluated new quarterback Donovan McNabb and determined which players fit into its schemes and were worth keeping.

“Kyle has got a lot of football in his background; what I mean by that is we’re on the same page,” Mike, 59, said. “We talk a lot of football; the running game, the passing game. It’s pretty easy to be connected because we spend so much time together talking ball.”

Coaches’ reviews were highly critical at times last season, as the Redskins averaged 5.36 yards per play, 14th-best in the 32-team NFL.

That is not good enough for Mike and Kyle Shanahan.

Kyle's offense during his two years calling plays in Houston ranked sixth (5.88 yards) and fourth (6.0 yards). During Mike's two Super Bowl seasons in Denver, the Broncos' offense ranked third each year.

They discussed the offense and exchanged ideas throughout the season, as all head coaches and coordinators do. However, their relationship allowed for greater candor.

"Sometimes I'd maybe be a little more nervous to piss the head coach off," Kyle, 31, said. "It's a little easier for me to ask him a tough question than maybe it has been [with other coaches] in the past. That has been nice because I can always ask that question. And definitely being his son, he probably gets more pissed off at me than he does with most people. So it goes both ways."

Earning respect

Kyle Shanahan expected to be the target of scrutiny and criticism after Mike decided to demote McNabb in Week 15 of last season. It's part of the package that comes with his job and his last name.

But he was caught off guard when McNabb's agent, Fletcher Smith, publicly blamed him for McNabb's falling out with the team. Smith accused Kyle of ignoring suggestions McNabb made to improve the offense. When Kyle confronted McNabb and McNabb told him Smith's allegations weren't true, Kyle could only press forward.

The situation would have been disastrous if it somehow cost Kyle the respect and confidence of players, but that didn't happen. In fact, it's the opposite.

"I think they handled it as good as you can," quarterback Rex Grossman said. "To bench somebody for their performance, anytime it's a Donovan McNabb-caliber player, there's no right way to do it. You're going to catch heat no matter what because he's a big name. They were in a lose-lose situation there."

You can't just take it from Grossman, though, because he directly benefited from McNabb's demotion and replaced him as the starter.

"I don't think anything with the Donovan situation makes Kyle a target," tight end Chris Cooley said. "What makes you a target is losing football games. If we're winning games, I think that situation probably still happens, maybe not to the extent it did. But winning overrules everything."

And toward that end, players are certain the best man for the job is running the Redskins' offense.

Not only did Kyle earn his reputation as a rising star offensive coach on his own, away from his father, Redskins players also have seen proof in meetings, the film room and on the field.

"This offense is so dynamic," receiver Santana Moss said. "The things that we can do offensively, individually and collectively, Kyle's offense gives us an opportunity to be great. All we have to do is go out there and handle our jobs. Last year, we left a lot on the field - I mean every game."

Cooley's belief in Kyle is at unprecedented levels.

“This is the first time in my career that an offense has fit so much that I’ve been willing to study it,” he said. “I’ve been willing to know it as thoroughly as I do. It’s exciting. It’s fun. It makes sense.”

“A lot of offenses have contradictions. Instead, this offense has answers. It’s neat to see the way we get everyone involved. It’s the first time I care what we’re doing on the line. I care what our quarterback’s reads are. I care about other positions besides mine.”

The benefits of youth

Mike Shanahan didn’t know exactly what to expect that day in March last year. He did all the required due diligence before hiring his new offensive coordinator, but Shanahan had never actually seen this coach run a meeting with the entire offense present.

“I was shocked to see how relaxed he was at his age,” Mike said. “Then I started thinking about it. The first time I got in front of a team was coming out of college. I was about 30 years old. He’s in that time frame, 30, 31, and he’s been doing it for six years. In high school, he was on the sideline in the Super Bowl. He’s been through it.”

Mike and Kyle’s professional growth together has continued from that first meeting. Their conversations are different now than they ever were.

When Kyle was growing up, topics centered on his playing career and the path he hoped would lead to the NFL. When Kyle broke into coaching, first with UCLA and then the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, the father-son discussions about coaching were limited because their experiences weren’t shared.

Now, because they work so closely together, the depth of their interaction is more beneficial to how they coach.

“Mike, I know, has learned a lot of things from Kyle, being so young but having the ear of players and just new things and different ways to do things,” Peggy Shanahan said.

Kyle, for example, uses film analysis to anchor his meetings. The young generation of NFL coaches entered the profession with the technology to digitally break down game footage. Many young coaches, such as Kyle, have developed their methods accordingly

In meetings, Kyle will show footage that splices how the Redskins ran a play incorrectly with footage of how they or another team ran it properly. That highlights the contrasts and teaching points.

“I know that’s something that’s not as big with the older coaches because they didn’t have the film capabilities that we have,” Kyle said. “I was pretty confident he would like how I did it. I had always wanted to show him.”

Kyle’s history as a receiver - he played the position at the University of Texas - and an NFL receivers coach also has helped Mike, a former quarterback, in his understanding of that position.

Because Kyle had his heart set on being an NFL receiver, he used to analyze his dad’s tapes of Jerry Rice, Rod Smith and others.

“When you study it to be a player, and you’re actually a wide receivers coach, you’ve got to know that as good as anybody,” Mike said.

In turn, Kyle has thrived under Mike's disciplined, detail-oriented coaching style.

If the Redskins' offense breaks down in a game, Mike follows up by asking Kyle whether he covered that play or concept in practice. The answer better be yes.

"If you're slipping, he will be your worst enemy and your biggest pain because he'll be all over you," Kyle said. "It makes you a better coach. You've got to think everything out and be organized."

Family time, football time

It doesn't matter whether your last name is Shanahan or Smith, there's never a bad time for ice cream.

Friday mornings around 10:30 suit Mike Shanahan perfectly. That's when he likes to drive the 10 minutes or so across Leesburg, Va., to Kyle's house and take grandchildren Stella, 4, and Carter, 1, out for a treat.

"He's a real good grandpa," Kyle said.

Kyle and Mike said they don't feel the need to see each other often outside of Redskins Park, but they do when Mike visits the grandkids and Kyle sees his mom. The convenience of those visits is just one of the perks of working together.

The NFL lockout this summer allowed for some additional time. Kyle's family, his sister Krystal's family, Peggy and Mike all went to the Bahamas.

Not that talk of football and the Redskins stayed behind. That has a passport, too.

"We annoy the heck out of my wife, my sister and my mom," Kyle said. "There's not many dinner tables that go by without it leading to football."

The conversation inevitably winds back to the job at hand.

Father and son have moved on to a new quarterback project now, as Mike's vision for the team starts to take shape.

He wants players who value the work it takes to win. Those who don't meet his standard, regardless of their resume or the size of their contract, will be gone.

"We're going to get people that are very passionate about what they do," Mike said. "They're here to win a Super Bowl, and I'm never going to go away from that mindset."

Mike's two Super Bowl rings don't guarantee success, though. Nor do the crooked numbers that Kyle's offenses put up in Houston. These two are starting over.

"That's this business - it's 'What have you done for me lately?' " Kyle said. "I feel very good that we can do it, but we've still got to go out and do it."

Winning the title this season seems improbable because of the massive scope of the Redskins' building project. It requires more than just two years.

But the Shanahans have the big picture in mind.

They expect to get to the top eventually and get there together.

“It’d be special, and that’s why I’m here,” Kyle said. “I came here for one reason, and that was to help my dad turn something around. It’s not easy, but it’s something we are enjoying. If that’s something that we can do, and I can be a part of it with him, that would mean a lot to me.”

Offensive Coordinator Kyle Shanahan

Two Shanahans make it work as Redskins rebuild

Peggy Shanahan feared the worst because she knows her husband and son as well as anybody. A pair of intense, detail-obsessed competitors working closely for 16 hours a day or more? Oh yeah, that would end well. She could see the outcome clearly — the awkward silence at family dinners, the tumultuous discussions on vacation. What a joy it would be for Mike to captain the Washington Redskins’ building project with Kyle as one of his top lieutenants.

“I actually thought they were both crazy when they wanted to do it,” Peggy said. “But it was obviously so different than that. It’s really a treat for both of them.”

On the eve of their second season as Redskins coach and offensive coordinator, Mike and Kyle Shanahan are reaping all of the personal rewards and many of the professional benefits they hoped for 20 months ago when Kyle left his promising coordinator position with the Houston Texans to work for his father.

Yet with questions at quarterback that persist after a bumpy 6-10 debut campaign, Mike and Kyle still have to prove their union will produce in Washington the same success on which they separately built their reputations in other cities.

“When you have any adversity and your last name is the same as the head coach’s, I know exactly what people are going to say,” Kyle said. “I’ve known my whole life. But I’m very confident in myself because of what I’ve done without him, and I’m also confident that you can ask any player that I’ve coached, and I feel very good about that.”

Not a lot of precedent

Wade Phillips has considered his father something of a hero for as long as he can remember. Growing up on Texas’ Gulf Coast, about 90 miles east of Houston, he learned football by hanging around the high school teams coached by his dad, Bum.

Wade played for Bum at Port Neches-Groves High School, and Bum was the defensive coordinator at the University of Houston when Wade was a linebacker there in the mid-1960s. Football always has been their connection. Over the years, Bum's philosophies, especially those about the 3-4 defense, became Wade's.

In 1981, Bum took his signature Stetson cowboy hat to New Orleans and became coach of the Saints. Wade served as Bum's defensive coordinator until Bum resigned during the 1985 season.

According to researchers at the Pro Football Hall of Fame, they were the only father-son, head coach-coordinator tandem on record until Mike and Kyle teamed in Washington last year.

"You want your assistant coaches to be loyal," said Wade, now the Texans' defensive coordinator. "Nobody is going to be more loyal than your son, so you can always count on that."

"They'll tell you the truth. Some other coaches might hesitate about telling you what they think about things, but if you ask your son, he's going to tell you exactly what he thinks. You get a valuable opinion there."

That was the case at Redskins Park last year as the first-year coaching staff evaluated new quarterback Donovan McNabb and determined which players fit into its schemes and were worth keeping.

"Kyle has got a lot of football in his background; what I mean by that is we're on the same page," Mike, 59, said. "We talk a lot of football; the running game, the passing game. It's pretty easy to be connected because we spend so much time together talking ball."

Coaches' reviews were highly critical at times last season, as the Redskins averaged 5.36 yards per play, 14th-best in the 32-team NFL.

That is not good enough for Mike and Kyle Shanahan.

Kyle's offense during his two years calling plays in Houston ranked sixth (5.88 yards) and fourth (6.0 yards). During Mike's two Super Bowl seasons in Denver, the Broncos' offense ranked third each year.

They discussed the offense and exchanged ideas throughout the season, as all head coaches and coordinators do. However, their relationship allowed for greater candor.

"Sometimes I'd maybe be a little more nervous to piss the head coach off," Kyle, 31, said. "It's a little easier for me to ask him a tough question than maybe it has been [with other coaches] in the past. That has been nice because I can always ask that question. And definitely being his son, he probably gets more pissed off at me than he does with most people. So it goes both ways."

Earning respect

Kyle Shanahan expected to be the target of scrutiny and criticism after Mike decided to demote McNabb in Week 15 of last season. It's part of the package that comes with his job and his last name.

But he was caught off guard when McNabb's agent, Fletcher Smith, publicly blamed him for McNabb's falling out with the team. Smith accused Kyle of ignoring suggestions McNabb made to improve the offense. When Kyle confronted McNabb and McNabb told him Smith's allegations weren't true, Kyle could only press forward.

The situation would have been disastrous if it somehow cost Kyle the respect and confidence of players, but that didn't happen. In fact, it's the opposite.

"I think they handled it as good as you can," quarterback Rex Grossman said. "To bench somebody for their performance, anytime it's a Donovan McNabb-caliber player, there's no right way to do it. You're going to catch heat no matter what because he's a big name. They were in a lose-lose situation there."

You can't just take it from Grossman, though, because he directly benefited from McNabb's demotion and replaced him as the starter.

"I don't think anything with the Donovan situation makes Kyle a target," tight end Chris Cooley said. "What makes you a target is losing football games. If we're winning games, I think that situation probably still happens, maybe not to the extent it did. But winning overrules everything."

And toward that end, players are certain the best man for the job is running the Redskins' offense.

Not only did Kyle earn his reputation as a rising star offensive coach on his own, away from his father, Redskins players also have seen proof in meetings, the film room and on the field.

"This offense is so dynamic," receiver Santana Moss said. "The things that we can do offensively, individually and collectively, Kyle's offense gives us an opportunity to be great. All we have to do is go out there and handle our jobs. Last year, we left a lot on the field - I mean every game."

Cooley's belief in Kyle is at unprecedented levels.

"This is the first time in my career that an offense has fit so much that I've been willing to study it," he said. "I've been willing to know it as thoroughly as I do. It's exciting. It's fun. It makes sense."

"A lot of offenses have contradictions. Instead, this offense has answers. It's neat to see the way we get everyone involved. It's the first time I care what we're doing on the line. I care what our quarterback's reads are. I care about other positions besides mine."

The benefits of youth

Mike Shanahan didn't know exactly what to expect that day in March last year. He did all the required due diligence before hiring his new offensive coordinator, but Shanahan had never actually seen this coach run a meeting with the entire offense present.

"I was shocked to see how relaxed he was at his age," Mike said. "Then I started thinking about it. The first time I got in front of a team was coming out of college. I was about 30 years old. He's in that time frame, 30, 31, and he's been doing it for six years. In high school, he was on the sideline in the Super Bowl. He's been through it."

Mike and Kyle's professional growth together has continued from that first meeting. Their conversations are different now than they ever were.

When Kyle was growing up, topics centered on his playing career and the path he hoped would lead to the NFL. When Kyle broke into coaching, first with UCLA and then the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, the father-son discussions about coaching were limited because their experiences weren't shared.

Now, because they work so closely together, the depth of their interaction is more beneficial to how they coach.

"Mike, I know, has learned a lot of things from Kyle, being so young but having the ear of players and just new things and different ways to do things," Peggy Shanahan said.

Kyle, for example, uses film analysis to anchor his meetings. The young generation of NFL coaches entered the profession with the technology to digitally break down game footage. Many young coaches, such as Kyle, have developed their methods accordingly

In meetings, Kyle will show footage that splices how the Redskins ran a play incorrectly with footage of how they or another team ran it properly. That highlights the contrasts and teaching points.

"I know that's something that's not as big with the older coaches because they didn't have the film capabilities that we have," Kyle said. "I was pretty confident he would like how I did it. I had always wanted to show him."

Kyle's history as a receiver - he played the position at the University of Texas - and an NFL receivers coach also has helped Mike, a former quarterback, in his understanding of that position.

Because Kyle had his heart set on being an NFL receiver, he used to analyze his dad's tapes of Jerry Rice, Rod Smith and others.

"When you study it to be a player, and you're actually a wide receivers coach, you've got to know that as good as anybody," Mike said.

In turn, Kyle has thrived under Mike's disciplined, detail-oriented coaching style.

If the Redskins' offense breaks down in a game, Mike follows up by asking Kyle whether he covered that play or concept in practice. The answer better be yes.

"If you're slipping, he will be your worst enemy and your biggest pain because he'll be all over you," Kyle said. "It makes you a better coach. You've got to think everything out and be organized."

Wide Receiver Anthony Armstrong

Anthony Armstrong eager for another shot vs. Dallas

Rick Maese

The Washington Post — The Insider

September 24, 2011

Last season Anthony Armstrong had the Redskins' visit to Dallas circled on his calendar. Sure the Cowboys are division rival, but it also marked a chance for Armstrong to go home and play against the team he not only grew up rooting for but the team he feels passed over him.

"I was a lot more amped last year because it was the first time going down and playing them," the receiver said this week. "Right now I think I'm just calm and cool about it. It's still fun to go home and play in front of the guys. ...To go down there and show them what they missed on, that's my goal."

In the Redskins' 33-30 loss there last December, Armstrong put on quite a show, turning in one of his best performances as a pro. In Rex Grossman's first game as a starter, Armstrong had the only 100-yard game of his career, making six receptions.

He's hoping to make another big impact Monday night, though this year Armstrong is the team's No. 3 receiver. He's seen plenty of action on the field but has caught just two passes in each of the team's first two games — 24 yards and a touchdown against the Giants and 14 yards last Sunday against the Cardinals.

"Hopefully I get a lot of opportunities and get to score in Dallas this time, in front of my mom and everything like that," Armstrong said. "That would be fun."

Growing up in Carrollton, Texas, Armstrong was a big Cowboys fan as a young boy. He played for some members of the Cowboys' staff while he was with the Dallas Desperados in the Arena League, and Armstrong felt the Cowboys should've given him an opportunity. Instead, his long, windy career path led him to Washington where he has a view of the rivalry from new perspective.

"There's a lot of intensity that goes with it. The D.C. area definitely has a lot of pride in beating Dallas," he said. "Hopefully we can go and do that for them on Monday night."

Safety Oshiomogho Atogwe

'Skins' Atogwe solid at safety

ASHBURN

--It's hard to miss the impression of raw power, the feeling of greatness, the aura of accomplishment when one takes a glimpse inside Oshiomogho Atogwe's locker at Redskins Park.

There, centered on the back wall of the wooden stall, hangs a sketch of an oversized, muscular, green superhero, his slightly tattered burgundy-and-gold pants encasing his lower body. He clutches the neck of a green-and-white eagle in his right hand and the collar of a lifeless blue cowboy in his left, and stands tall upon the body of a giant whose "NY" dog tags are wrapped around his right foot.

But it's the tuft of black hair standing straight off the top of his head that truly begs the question: Is this The Incredible Hulk, or is it Atogwe himself?

The answer is not so easy to come by.

"I feel like as a football player, a lot of times, you want to emulate that, because when you're on that field, you're a totally different person than you are when you're walking around on the street," Atogwe said. "It's just kind of synonymous, and I like him because he's just the strongest there is. No one is stronger than The Hulk."

The affinity for the character came at a young age when Atogwe, the son of Nigerian immigrants, moved to Windsor, Ontario, when his parents decided a relocation was necessary to ensure a better future for their children. He would watch the cartoons and the TV show, read the comic books and collect the action figures, of which nearly a dozen still keep a watchful eye over the 5-foot-11, 205-pound safety's possessions at the training complex.

"I guess I was just fascinated by his character and how you look at Bruce Banner, who was a brilliant, geeky, weak scientist, and within that man was The Hulk," said Atogwe, himself a graduate of Stanford who majored in biological sciences. "Within him was the monster who was uncontrollable rage."

That's what the Redskins were hoping for when they signed Atogwe to a five-year, $26 million contract in early March, before the five-month owners' lockout began. A veteran in his seventh year, Atogwe was the anchor of a St. Louis secondary each of his first six seasons who finished with at least 70 tackles and led the NFC with eight interceptions in 2007.

He signed a five-year, $32 million contract with the Rams in June 2010 and expected to spend significant time playing for the team that will host the Redskins this Sunday. Instead, the team decided in February it did not want to pay an $8 million roster bonus Atogwe was due and released him, freeing him to sign with the Redskins two weeks later.

St. Louis head coach Steve Spagnuolo said Wednesday it was not a simple decision to let Atogwe go, but rather one dictated by the business of the NFL. If anyone can't wait to see Atogwe when the Redskins arrive for Sunday's game, it's Spagnuolo.

"He is one of my all-time favorite guys," Spagnuolo said. "He's everything that you would want in a player playing for your football team, both as a competitor and as a person. We miss certainly his character here and his football abilities."

Redskins defensive coordinator Jim Haslett was familiar with Atogwe from their time together in St. Louis, which ended in 2008 when Haslett left the team after three years--much of the last as the interim head coach.

When Atogwe became a free agent, Haslett expressed a desire to bring him to Washington. After all, the free safety knew Haslett's defensive schemes, and the Redskins were looking for a way to upgrade their abysmal pass defense.

Through three games, Atogwe has 15 tackles, including seven in what Haslett described as his best game Monday, an 18-16 loss at Dallas.

"He's a student of the game," Redskins head coach Mike Shanahan said. "He's very smart. He likes to play and he's very accountable. He's a team leader both on and off the football field. You like people that prepare themselves every week, and he's one of those guys."

Both deeply spiritual and highly intellectual, Atogwe carries himself with an air of class. His first name means "God knows the day," and though he's commonly referred to as O.J., he prefers that the nickname be used only by friends and close acquaintances until a level of trust and understanding can be reached.

Around Redskins Park, there's a growing understanding of what Atogwe can do. Teammates and coaches are starting to take notice, and the only green Atogwe knows is fading with experience.

The smarter Atogwe gets, the stronger Atogwe gets.

"I feel like I'm getting comfortable in the system, getting comfortable with the players around me, and as we continue to grow as a defense, I know my play will excel and continue to be what I envision it to be," Atogwe said.

Hulk alert: Redskins' S Atogwe loves his comics

Joseph White
Yahoo! Sports
September 30, 2011

ASHBURN, Va. (AP)—The move from the St. Louis Rams to the Washington Redskins has brought some new additions to Oshiomogho Atogwe's\(notes\) Incredible Hulk collection.

Along with the dozen or so green Hulk figurines that take up much of the shelf space in Atogwe's locker, there's also a drawing made by Atogwe's wife, Jill. It depicts the veteran safety as the notorious comic book and movie character fending off symbols of all three of the Redskins' NFC East rivals—pushing over a cowboy dressed in blue, stomping on a giant with "NY" dog tags and clutching an eagle in his left hand.

There's also an unusual red version of the Hulk sitting in the next locker over, the one that belongs to fellow safety LaRon Landry\(notes\).

"That's him," said Atogwe, nodding toward Landry. "The Red Hulk's craaazy. Craaaaaaaazy."

Atogwe and Landry are the backside of the Redskins secondary, the ying-and-yang duo meant to improve a defense that ranked 31st last year. The pairing got off to a slow start because of injuries to both during training camp, and Sunday's game at St. Louis—when Atogwe returns to the city where he played for six seasons—will mark just their second game together.

"They're two different-type guys," defensive coordinator Jim Haslett said. "One's kind of high-strung. One's level-headed, relaxed. But they work together well. They talk. They sit together in meetings, They talk through plays. I think it's a good mixture."

In case there's any doubt, Atogwe is the level-headed half, acquired as a free agent in a five-year, $26 million deal signed just before the NFL lockout began in March. Sitting at his locker, he's as calm as the mild-mannered Dr. David Banner, the scientist who transforms into the Hulk.

"I guess that's why I was attracted to it," Atogwe said. "There's two sides to the Hulk. Every football player has two sides to him—the way you are on the field, the way you are off the field. You ain't the same guy."

Landry, of course, being the exception.

"This guy," said Atogwe, again looking at Landry, "is crazy all the time."

Atogwe became a fan of the Hulk as a youngster, and his comic books collection runs into the thousands. He'll happily give you a quick review of the recent Hulk movies, but he dropped a 1980s TV reference by saying: "When you think of the Hulk, you think of Lou Ferrigno."

For most of his time in St. Louis, Atogwe was a bright spot on a bad team. He was the Rams' MVP in 2009 and considered a solid locker-room leader. Before he left, he gave out parting gifts derived from comic books—cornerback Justin King\(notes\) got the Nightcrawler, cornerback Bradley Fletcher\(notes\) received the Juggernaut. "O.J. put everything into comic books," said King, using the nickname Atogwe prefers to be used only by his friends. "He was fun that way."

Atogwe said he's looking forward to Sunday's game, but that there's no bad blood with his old team. It wouldn't be his style to say so anyway.

"He's very smart," coach Mike Shanahan said. "He likes to play and he's very accountable. He's a team leader both on and off the football field. You like people that prepare themselves every week and he's one of those guys."

Notes: Three players were limited in practice Thursday, and each has a hamstring injury: WR Anthony Armstrong\(notes\), S DeJon Gomes\(notes\) and FB Darrel Young\(notes\). ... Rookie LB Ryan Kerrigan\(notes\) was selected as the NFL defensive rookie of the month for September. The first-round pick's highlight was the interception he returned for the go-ahead touchdown in Week 1 against the New York Giants.

Wide Receiver Terrence Austin

Redskins wide receiver Terrence Austin sees his hard work pay off

Rick Maese
The Washington Post
August 29, 2011

Tuesdays at an NFL facility are typically reserved for coaches: film review, game planning, meetings.

Players take the day off, allowing their bodies to heal before they kick off a new week of practices the next morning.

But last year, rookie wide receiver Terrence Austin would visit Redskins Park every Tuesday and head to the practice fields with the team's third-string quarterback, John Beck. "Windy, freezing days," Beck said.

The two would squeeze in an extra practice, Beck determined to master the offense and Austin intent on working his way off the practice squad. A season later, Beck is still waiting to learn whether he'll be the Redskins' starting quarterback, but heading into the final preseason game Thursday against Tampa Bay, Austin has already done his best to secure a spot on the 53-man roster. In fact, he's been perhaps the team's biggest preseason surprise thus far.

"He doesn't scream NFL talent, but he is," offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan said. "It's because he's quick, he's detailed on everything and you can go to him in any situation. Quarterbacks love him. He showed last year what he was, but it takes those guys a little bit of time to figure out the NFL, and to get that swagger. But you can tell he's got it now."

Generously listed at 5 feet 11 and 175 pounds, Austin was a seventh-round pick out of UCLA a year ago who had hoped to earn a roster spot as a rookie. When the Redskins made their cuts, Austin had trouble processing the news that he'd begin his pro career on the practice squad.

"I struggled with trying to figure out, 'Do I really belong in the league? Am I good enough?' " he said. "I thought I'd worked hard, but it was an internal struggle, all these things I'd never thought about before."

"I couldn't understand what it was that prevented me from making it, especially when I thought that I was good enough."

When he was invited to join the practice squad, Austin figured each day was another chance to impress upon coaches that he belonged. But first, he had to realize that he was raw and had a lot of room for growth. In retrospect, he says spending the first 11 weeks of the 2010 season on the practice squad was a blessing.

"Everybody wants to be on the 53. I wasn't used to me not making it. I mean, I've been making it all my life. I've always been in an important role," said the 23-year old Austin. "I had to understand that I needed a whole lot of development. I really did. I had to understand that in the NFL, you got to be more of a student of the game. You got to realize that your physical attributes aren't going to get you by all the time."

So, Austin showed up every Tuesday and ran routes, catching pass after pass from Beck. During practices Wednesday through Friday, he'd line up with the scout team, where his real education took place.

"You think about practice squad, you're going against the 'ones' every single day for a whole season," said wide receiver Anthony Armstrong, who has spent time on practice squads in Miami and Washington. "If you're going against guys like [DeAngelo] Hall, Josh Wilson, Phillip Buchanon day in and day out, you have no choice but to get better. . . . The coaches see what you can do against that competition and they have more confidence to put you in the regular offense."

That has been the case this August. Redskins coaches have given Austin a bigger role with each preseason game. He appeared in the team's final five games last season, recording just three catches for 47 yards. But entering Thursday's contest, he has a team-high 140 receiving yards on 10 catches. He scored a touchdown last week at Baltimore and threw a key block that led to another.

"He's a lot more mature after learning defenses in the National Football League, and I think he'll keep on getting better," Redskins Coach Mike Shanahan said. "The one thing you can't teach a guy is to be fearless, especially at his size. Regardless if it's special teams, returning punts or kickoffs, running routes or blocking, it doesn't take long to see that he doesn't have a lot of fear."

Austin may have entered training camp low on the depth chart, but he's made a compelling case for the 53-man roster. The tougher decision for coaches might be which wide receiver now gets left off: Niles Paul, a fifth-round pick? Speedy returner Brandon Banks? Talented veteran Donte Stallworth?

Thursday's game will be players' last chance to make their case. Banks returned to practice Monday and will try to remind coaches that he can be a game-changer returning punts and kickoffs. Young receivers such as Paul, Leonard Hankerson and Aldrick Robinson will likely see more playing time than they have in previous games.

While Austin hopes to spend as much time on the field as possible, coaches have seen plenty from him already and know what to expect.

"He's been a student of the game, he's a guy who's working out all the time," Mike Shanahan said. "So it really doesn't surprise us that he's taken his game to a different level."

Austin's power lies in his returns

--The ability to return kickoffs and punts has made Terrence Austin valuable to the Washington Redskins.

At least, that's the way Austin wants them to see it.

"It's helping," Austin, a 5-foot-11, 175-pound receiver, said. "It's just definitely showing the coaches that I'm versatile and I've got some type of value. If I'm able to do that, I can show why I deserve to be on the team."

A cursory look at the roster demonstrates the need for a multidimensional player. The Redskins will likely keep six receivers on the 53-man roster; Santana Moss and Jabar Gaffney are virtually assured spots, Anthony Armstrong is making a strong case to stick around and third round pick Leonard Hankerson has a claim on a fourth position.

That leaves Austin--who spent much of last season on the practice squad--among those fighting to make the cut. He returned four punts for 45 yards in the Redskins' 16-3 victory at Indianapolis on Friday, including a 29-yard return in the first quarter, and served as the primary kick returner (although both Colts kickoffs went for touchbacks).

What Austin did differently Friday, though, was catch passes. Primarily a third-down receiver at UCLA, he had just three catches for 42 yards. Against the Colts, Austin made three catches for 23 yards.

He was electric as a returner at UCLA, where he returned a total of 95 punts over four years and 89 kickoffs in 2008 and 2009, his final two seasons.

"I mean, I've been working pretty hard, and I got a little bit better, obviously, because I had a lot more work to do [after] last year," Austin said. "I got with coach Keenan [McCardell, the wide receivers coach], and did a lot of work on the practice squad last year and just started learning a little bit more about playing and learning my craft at wide receiver."

The opportunity for Austin to serve in both roles came Friday as the result of Brandon Banks' knee injury. Banks, last season's primary returner, had a 19-yard punt return and a 58-yard kickoff return Aug. 12 against Pittsburgh, but swelling in his surgically repaired left knee kept him out of the Indianapolis game.

Austin also fielded a kickoff but downed it for a touchback in the Pittsburgh game. He caught two passes for 46 yards, including a 38-yard reception from Rex Grossman in the second quarter.

"You just look at him on paper and he doesn't scream out that he's going to be an NFL talent, but he is, and that's because he's quick, he's detailed in everything and he's very dependable," said offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan. "Quarterbacks love him, and you'll go to him in any situation."

The ability to demonstrate his proficiency in the receiving game is crucial. Banks, who averaged 11.3 yards on 38 punt returns and 25.1 yards on 46 kickoff returns in 13 games last season, was a non-factor as a receiver, catching only two passes for 10 yards.

Out since Aug. 16 with swelling in his surgically repaired left knee, Banks has been undergoing platelet-rich plasma therapy, designed to stimulate healing and lead to a faster recovery.

It's unlikely that both Banks and Austin will make the team. One option is for the Redskins to place Banks on injured reserve before the season begins, which would allow them to keep his rights without having him occupy a spot on the roster.

Those types of decisions, head coach Mike Shanahan said, are complicated, and they're not yet ones the team has begun to explore.

"Sometimes you'll go a little bit deeper at one position than others because of the depth that you have, and you don't want to put a guy out there who has a chance to be picked up by another football team," Shanahan said.

"Or, you might just be not very deep at one position, and you might be looking to get somebody from another football team to add to your squad. A lot of variables, and with two games left, it's really hard to say which direction you're going to go."

Kyle Shanahan described Austin as a "gym rat" and said he has shown he has the swagger and confidence required to succeed in the league. Austin's work ethic has translated, especially with something he's enjoyed doing.

"I've always been catching punts in practice," Austin said. "That's something you've got to keep practicing. I mean, that's one of the toughest catches in football, so if you shy away from that for a while, it's going to be tough getting back into it. I've been practicing, and so I didn't lose a step at all."

Wide Receiver Brandon Banks

Banks returns to Trojan Stadium

Kelly Griffith

Garner News

10/27/11

In the second season of his NFL career as a Washington Redskin, Brandon Banks finally got the chance to return to Garner. After five years away at Kansas State University and now in the NFL, Banks came home during the Redskins' bye week to attend the Trojans' game at home against West Johnston.

"It was great to get back to Garner and see everybody that I haven't see in a while," he said. "It was good to be home."

The trip wasn't long – just Thursday evening and all day Friday – because he went to the Kansas State football game Saturday.

But while he was back in Trojan Stadium, Garner made the 2006 GMHS graduate feel welcome. He tossed the coin before the game.

"That was a great honor," Banks said. "I was honored that Coach Smith would allow me back on the field and to be a part of that tradition."

Banks said his four years starting as a running back/wide receiver/quarterback/safety/punt and kick returner prepared him to be a wide receiver today. The great competition he played against and training he received from coaches helped him down the road.

"It helped me get this far," he said. "My goal had always been to get to the NFL."

Being a Trojan also prepared him for the pressures of the NFL. There is much more pressure to perform now.

"We had a tradition in Garner – a winning tradition," he said. "Everybody wants to win every game."

His best advice for the Trojans who want to play professionally – anything's possible. Work hard, stay in school and get good grades he said.

By following that advice, some of today's Trojans could be pros in the years to come. They may even play with or against Banks.

He said he was inspired by Barry Sanders and Santana Moss, a fellow Redskin. Moss was one of the first players Banks met when he went to D.C. before the 2010-11 season.

Going from having posters of Moss up in his room to now working alongside one of his biggest inspirations has been a wonderful experience for Banks.

"It's crazy. It's a dream come true," he said.

Redskins' Brandon Banks fills team need for speed

Carla Peay
The Washington Times
September 22, 2011

Move over, Usain Bolt. The fastest man in the world just might be Washington Redskins wide receiver and return specialist Brandon Banks. Or at least, in America. Just ask him.

"I'm the fastest guy on the team, I'm the fastest guy in the league, I'm the fastest guy almost in America," Banks said with a laugh. "No, I'm just playing,"

Banks' time in the 40-yard dash has been clocked at around 4.25 seconds.

"Speed kills in this league, so that's kind of the slogan I go by," he said. "My speed gives me an opportunity to go by guys and make them miss."

At 5-foot-7 and around 155 pounds, Banks knows he's hardly built like a typical football player. But he's made a career with speed and quickness, and an ability to run around a wall of defenders that he's too small to run over.

"My role is to field kicks, get good field position and try to put six on the board, which is what I want to do every time I touch the ball," he said. "Hopefully, I can do that and put us in a position to win."

During last week's 22-21 win over Arizona, Banks made a 35-yard gain on a return when he eluded three blockers coming up the middle by literally running around them. "I rely on my speed and just touch the blockers, guys like [fullback] Darrel Young and [linebacker] Lorenzo Alexander," Banks said. "They basically get me to the wall by coming in and making enough good blocks."

Banks knows all about running around, over, and through walls — he's done it all his life.

"I just use it as motivation," Banks said of the phrase he's heard since he was young: that he was too small to make it in the NFL. "I like when people tell me I can't make it because it gives me a better attitude to go out there and do it just to prove them wrong," Banks said.

A scoring threat every time he touches the ball, his teammates - particularly those who block for him - think of him as their own special weapon and a player who helps make them look good.

"Brandon is very dynamic. Anytime he touches the ball, he has a chance to go the distance," said safety Reed Doughty. "As a guy who gets to block for him week in and week out, you just try to put a body on people and let him make you look good and make him move down the field."

"He's the type of guy that's special. Hopefully, we'll keep getting blocks and we can get him in the end zone." Defensive end Kedric Golston said Banks is one of those players that makes you get up off the bench.

"If you really watch Brandon, anytime he touches the ball he can take it the distance," Golston said. "There are very few players in the league that, when it's their time to get the ball, everybody stands up to watch him. He has unique speed and quickness and he's a big-play guy."

"I think that he uses what people would consider a weakness, as far as his size, and uses it as his strength. He's hard to see, he's low to the ground and he's hard to tackle because he's a smaller target."

Golston believes Banks' ability to overcome his size says just as much about his character as it does his talent. "For him to fight back the way he does after hearing all his life that he's too little to play football says something about the type of guy that he is," Golston said. "It doesn't matter what you say about him, he's going to get the job done."

Young thinks that in addition to his great speed, Banks also has great vision.

"You look at guys, yeah, we're all hustling and stuff, but he's setting up blocks," Young said. "I don't care what you say, sideline to sideline, there's a lot of guys who can run in the league, but you ain't gonna catch him."

Banks hasn't scored a touchdown yet in victories over the New York Giants and the Cardinals, but he said the momentum of a Monday game in Dallas against the hated Cowboys could be the night.

"It's a big-time rivalry that's been going on for years," Banks said. "Hopefully, we're on the winning side this coming Monday."

Redskins' Banks up to speed on new rule

The Washington Times
August 14, 2011

It was one of those moments when you have to rub your eyes to make sure what you're seeing is real. Only a few feet of grass were visible between Brandon Banks' heels and the back of the end zone when he caught the kickoff Friday night. Surely he would just kneel for a touchback and give the Washington Redskins possession at their 20-yard line.

In a flash, though, Banks was racing across midfield. And when you consider the special set of circumstances, it wasn't that surprising, after all.

Banks has unique speed, and it was a preseason game. And most notably, the NFL has implemented new kickoff rules this season.

To reduce the frequency of high-impact collisions typical on kickoffs, the league has required teams to kick off from their 35-yard line instead of the 30. The intent is to reduce the amount of returns, but Banks wouldn't let an opportunity pass.

"If Danny [Smith, special teams coach] tells me I can bring it out, that's what I'm going to do," Banks said after

Sunday's practice. "I'm going to try to run it back every time."

The Redskins' top return man, however, realizes the new rule diminishes his value.

"It is what it is," he conceded. "I've got to follow the rules."

The kickoffs in Washington's 16-7 victory over Pittsburgh on Friday were a microcosm of the league-wide results during the first weekend of preseason games. Of the seven kickoffs in the game, Banks' 58-yard return was the only one that didn't result in a touchback.

Redskins kicker Graham Gano booted all five of his kickoffs through the end zone.

"I hope they keep it that way," Gano said with a smile. "It was a lot of fun."

Fun for him, maybe. Rather boring, though, for those who looked forward to one of the sport's most unpredictable plays.

And for Smith, it means more strategic planning on both sides of the ball.

He decides the circumstances under which Banks or any Redskins return man can run the ball out of the end zone. Banks had his permission to bring it out Friday night.

"There's a lot that goes into that thing: Who's your returner? How good is your coverage? What's the hang time?" Smith said. "We have a standard, and you have to meet certain things to be able to bring the ball out."

It's a major drag for Banks, who became something of a star last season as a return specialist on a team with a dearth of playmakers. He took one kickoff back 96 yards for a touchdown against Detroit.

At 5-7, 155 pounds, his speed and shiftiness are critical assets in the return game, but his size limits his effectiveness as a receiver. He has to make his mark on special teams.

"I'm not too happy with [the rule], and I think Brandon can agree," said Redskins receiver Terrence Austin, who kneeled on a kickoff in the end zone for a touchback Friday. "He's a special guy. If it's 8 yards deep, he's the type of guy that would be able to take it out."

Also hurting Banks' push to make the roster again in his second NFL season is lingering soreness in his surgically repaired left knee. He missed practice Sunday after having "a few CCs" of fluid drained from it, coach Mike Shanahan said.

"That's part of camp, part of the process," Shanahan said. "As he gets in better football shape, he's going to feel better in game situations. Our game plan is to have him full speed by the first game of the season."

Banks is eager to be full-speed ahead, too, both health-wise and coming out of the end zone.

"Whenever Danny gives me the green light," he said, "that's when I go."

Gameday Q&A: Kevin Barnes on growth, the Terps and music

Mike Jones

The Washington Post—The Insider

October 2, 2011

One of the younger players that the Washington Redskins are counting on this season is third-year cornerback Kevin Barnes, who has seen his role with the team change drastically in the last year.

Drafted in the third round out of Maryland two years ago, Barnes rarely played as a rookie, and last season appeared in 10 games, but was used primarily as a backup safety when that unit was decimated by injury.

This season, Barnes is the team's third cornerback behind DeAngelo Hall and Josh Wilson. With the team running a lot of "Nickel" packages, he finds himself on the field for the bulk of Washington's defensive plays.

Last week Barnes recorded his first interception of the season, which equals his total for last year.

In today's Gameday Q&A, the local product talks about his growth, goals, roots and hobbies:

You got your first interception of the season last week. How good did it feel to get that first pick?

"It definitely felt good. I wish I could've gotten some return yards, but I didn't feel comfortable as far as the footing and I couldn't really maneuver my body. But any time a DB gets his hands on the ball, it's a good feeling and hopefully more come my way.

How different are things for you this year as opposed to the last two seasons, when you were just hoping to be active?

"I'm definitely embracing it. First two years here I played some, but definitely a humbling experience. I definitely love the game now more than ever. [Not playing] was kind of taking away from it, but I definitely appreciate my coaches having confidence in me."

What did you expect of yourself when the season began?

"I thought I could've had a little more responsibility had things turned out differently -- being with the coaches all offseason -- but I'm happy with the way things are going right now, and as long as I can help my team win, I'm satisfied."

Obviously, you want to win, but have you set any individual goals for yourself?

"I haven't really set any individual goals, but I want to go out every game and I don't want anybody to catch a pass on me. That's the only goal really. I can remember every pass from preseason to now and that's the thing I hate, regardless of how long or short. I just hate having a pass caught on me."

How do you like having another former Terp, Josh Wilson, in the secondary with you?

“It’s real cool. There are times where we’ll be on the sidelines, talking, reminiscing about old stories. We’re all real close.”

Do you like Maryland’s new uniforms?

“Definitely. My freshman class was the first to wear UnderArmour at Maryland, and they’ve been talking for years about different uniforms and different colors, but it’s definitely going to help recruiting. Simple stuff like that can convince a kid to go to a school. Because me, I liked Maryland, but also my favorite colors were black and red. I remember when I went on my visit, I tried on a jersey, had my name on the back, and I said, ‘Yeah, I’m definitely coming here.’ So, I see what they’re doing with that.”

What is that like playing so close to where you played high school?

“Sometimes, it’s still a dream. I feel like I’m spoiled to a certain extent. I saw an interview that Hightower did a little bit ago and he said he couldn’t imagine going from college to being drafted to here because he probably couldn’t have handled it. But me, I really haven’t left. I grew up in North Carolina for a little bit, but high school in Maryland, college in Maryland, and our stadium is in Maryland. I haven’t really had the chance to go anywhere, so I’m pretty spoiled right now.”

Because of that, do you do a lot of off-season traveling?

“I go up and down the East Coast. I’m an East Coast kind of guy. I go to New York a little bit, go down to Florida, see my family in North Carolina, go up to Rhode Island, where my fiancé is, but I’m pretty much an East Coast guy.”

What are your hobbies?

“I’m an avid gamer, I like music. I want to start deejaying, getting some equipment. Music, no matter what happens -- bad day, good day -- music can make me feel good. I love music, video games, just relaxing with my family.”

Who’s your favorite artist?

“Jay-Z’s my favorite rapper, but lately I’ve been listening to a lot of old stuff, familiarizing myself with the past.”

Do you do a lot of mixing?

“For my birthday last year, my fiancé bought me a set of turntables, and now my music is up to – I don’t know how many songs I have – but I know my hard drive takes about 15 hours for my music to load. So I have a lot of songs. I’m always on the iPod and doing a mix for in here [in the locker room], so guys know what I have.”

Do you have a special pre-game track?

"Pre-game track, it varies from week to week. Hotel the night before the game, I'll download some music and come up with something I know the guys will want to listen to before the game. Not a certain song, because I put so much on it every week that I make a different play list every week."

Redskins' Kevin Barnes takes heavy hitting to next level

Stephen Whyno
The Washington Times
August 16, 2011

It was in September 2008 when Kevin Barnes — then a cornerback at Maryland — hit Jahvid Best so hard the Cal running back lost his lunch and had to leave the game. Thanks to YouTube and his career with the Washington Redskins, Barnes still hears about it whenever he interacts with fans.

"It's something that a lot of people around here aren't going to forget," he said.

That's the lasting memory of Barnes so far, but now he's expected to do more. With injuries in the secondary and Phillip Buchanon suspended for the first four regular-season games, the third-year pro has no other choice but to grow up fast and fill a major need.

"I'm still a young guy; I'm only 24. I have a lot left in me," Barnes said. "I don't think I've reached halfway as far as my potential."

Barnes is the nickel cornerback behind starters DeAngelo Hall and Josh Wilson in the rotation. He was the Redskins' third-round pick in 2009 but still is growing and adjusting; he has appeared in just 14 NFL games with no sacks and one interception.

"He can make a play on a ball, and that's what you need. He's a hard-hitter, and he's a football player," said Wilson, who was signed away from Baltimore in the offseason but was a teammate of Barnes with the Terrapins. "If everything comes together, he can be more than even what he is right now."

That's the step Barnes must take — from a player with unrealized potential to regular contributor.

Defensive backs coach Bob Slowik knows what Barnes can do from a hitting standpoint and said coverage skills are expected to improve with all his players. But there are other things he would like to see out of Barnes.

"Just playmaking — just like anybody that goes in there," Slowik said. "You'd like to see him be physical, finish plays, make plays, very few mental mistakes, give great effort and just show what he can do."

The Redskins knew a bit of what Barnes could do having him around for the past two years, but they still signed Buchanon knowing the veteran was facing a four-game suspension. That's not an affront to Barnes, Slowik said, but it's still a challenge.

And it's one Barnes welcomes.

"I can't be mad at [Buchanon]. If coach wants us to compete, we'll compete," he said. "Coach [Mike] Shanahan has brought in many people at every position, so for me to think I'm any [more] special than anybody else and I don't need to be pushed is completely air-headed to me. I expect for whoever to be here to come in and compete. I wouldn't want it any other way."

Fortunately for Barnes, he's getting his chances. In the preseason opener against the Pittsburgh Steelers, he led Washington with five tackles and had a sack. The 24-year-old played in all four quarters and took the most snaps of any defensive back.

Barnes also spent the first week-and-a-half of training camp with the starters before Wilson stepped in. "Practice snaps are precious, so those opportunities for him with the first unit — they're invaluable, and I think he gained a little bit of confidence because he's not only working with the first-unit defense but he's also working against the first-unit offense," Slowik said. "That was a big help to him."

Barnes has split his time between outside cornerback and nickel, both against Pittsburgh and at Redskins Park. Slowik called the balancing act between those two positions "probably the most mentally challenging of all the things you have to do."

It's hard to question Barnes' physical tools. As Wilson pointed out, Barnes is "tall, has long arms [and] great speed." Now is his chance to prove that his mental game has progressed sufficiently for the Redskins to trust him in key situations.

"He's there, he's working hard, he's made great strides and improved tremendously from last year, but he's got to keep doing it and do it in the game," Slowik said. "He's improved a lot since last year, but he still has to make a lot more improvement."

QB John Beck

Childhood rivals John Beck, Ryan Fitzpatrick reunite Sunday

Mike Jones
The Washington Post
October 27, 2011

When John Beck leads the Washington Redskins against the Buffalo Bills in Toronto on Sunday, it won't mark the first occasion, or sport, in which he has against Bills quarterback Ryan Fitzpatrick.

Growing up about half an hour from Phoenix, Beck and Fitzpatrick have known each other since they were roughly 7 and 8 years old.

"I think it started off with swimming to be honest," Fitzpatrick said Wednesday in a conference call with Redskins beat writers. "He's a year older than I am. ... We grew up playing sports against each other and even at one point kind of training with the same guy back in high school."

Said Beck: "We've known each other since we were 7 years old, 8 years old. So he's a guy whose story I do know because we played all sports against each other, so I've followed Ryan."

Fitzpatrick said that back in those swimming days, Beck was excelled at backstroke.

“When he was 9 or 10 years old, I think he was maybe the best at backstroke in the state,” Fitzpatrick recalls.

Beck went to Mountain View in Mesa, while Fitzpatrick played for Highland in Gilbert. But the two never actually played a game against each other.

“I think he was two years ahead of me,” Fitzpatrick said. “When I was a sophomore, I got brought up to varsity, but was the third-string guy. John was playing and my brother was the quarterback at Highland, and my brother broke his collar bone in that game. I guess that’s what I remember most about that. I played Mountain View again, but he was already gone, either on his mission or at BYU by the time I was actually playing.”

Although Beck was ahead of Fitzpatrick back then, now the Redskins’ passer hopes his perseverance in the NFL pays off in similar fashion as Fitzgerald’s.

Fitzpatrick bounced around from St. Louis, to Cincinnati and now finally Buffalo, where he has established himself as a quality starting quarter.

Beck started out his career in Miami in 2007, and now after five seasons of inactivity finally has gotten a chance to prove he can start in the NFL.

“I’m really happy to see his success, but there is [similarity] because I know his story that he just kept working and, at one point, he was out of football and then he got picked up by the Cincinnati Bengals and played in I believe 12 games or 13 games for them that year. It’s just a good example – if you keep working, good things can happen.

Brock Huard Taught John Beck Not To Read Newspapers (But Watching TV Is OK)

Zac Boyer
The Free Lance Star
August 29, 2011

ASHBURN — John Beck was spinning a yarn today, as they say, and spoke to reporters for 15 minutes. It was great, in a way, because we’ve all talked to Beck so much over the past four weeks about the quarterback battle that we, and he, had almost run out of things to discuss.

But Beck is always good to chat, and he was asked about how he’s dealt with the hype and the quarterback situation with so much scrutiny on the team. Beck said that he doesn’t read the newspaper, watch television or want anything to do with the media away from the complex. He told the story Monday of watching a University of Washington game a decade back while he was in high school and hearing about how quarterback Brock Huard was told by his brother, Damon, to ignore any media reports because, regardless of whether they are positive or negative, they can provide a distraction.

“Now, in high school, Mom was cutting out the articles, so I did see them, but in college, never once,” Beck said. “I just tried to do my best. You actually hear about it enough when you stop at a restaurant and the people next to you are saying, ‘Hey, I read this about you,’ this and that. You hear it, but you just try to hear your best and filter it so it’s not an overload.”

What Beck did hear was how during the ESPN telecast of Thursday’s game, Jon Gruden, the former Tampa Bay head coach who is now a commentator, said Beck would be the starter if he was coaching the Redskins. Beck said he held the comments in high regard, but fellow QB competitor Rex Grossman had the line of the day in response: “I’m glad I’m not playing for Jon Gruden.”

Beck also talked about his friendship with New Orleans quarterback Drew Brees. The two had a chance to meet before reporting to camp late in July.

“The whole purpose of being around [him] was just to try to soak in what he does,” Beck said. “What’s made him successful, his work ethic, the way he approaches the game. The times that I just get to sit down and talk with him. Before I left San Diego to come here, we sat down for a couple hours, just in a room, going over what it is to try to be the best quarterback that you can be and the things that a starting quarterback faces in the NFL and how he approached it.

“Really, the only taste that I had at being a starting quarterback was with the Dolphins when we were 0-9 and I became the starter, and that in itself was a tricky situation to be a part of. But Drew has been able to battle through adversity, come out on top, take his team to the Super Bowl, so it was great just to be around him, talk to him about those different things and about what he did to succeed. I felt like although our adversities were different, it was still a battle against something, and he came out on top and that’s what I was trying to do.”

What the Redskins see in John Beck

Dan Graziano
ESPN.com: NFL Nation
August 16, 2011

ASHBURN, Va. -- You've made up your mind on John Beck. You think he's a human white flag -- that the Washington Redskins are out of their minds for even considering him as their starting quarterback for 2011 and that the only thing Mike Shanahan can be hoping to accomplish is to lose enough games to draft a franchise quarterback in the first round of next year's draft. The way you look at it, Beck's been in the league four years, showed nothing in the brief chance he got in his rookie season with the Dolphins and if he was going to be a good NFL quarterback, we'd have seen it by now.

Beck knows what you think. He's not blind or deaf. He's aware of the doubters, but he's not among them. He would like you to consider him and the NFL career he envisions for himself the same way he considers it -- as a work in progress.

"I'm kind of chiseling my way at a sculpture," Beck told me this month after a practice at Redskins training camp. "And I know what I want it to look like, and I believe that it will be. I've been chiseling away, and there's still a lot more to chisel away at. And there's going to be more times where I'm going to stand back and say, 'Okay, now what do I have to do?' And then I'm going to walk towards it and chisel away some things and then stand back again. There's still a lot left to do."

Beck missed practice last week and the Redskins' preseason opener Friday due to a groin injury. Rex Grossman, his nominal competition for the starting quarterback's job, played very well, leading some to believe Grossman had become the front-runner. But those who would say that haven't spoken with Shanahan, the Redskins' head coach, or his son Kyle, their offensive coordinator. When you talk to those guys, you get the definite impression that they want Beck to win this job, because they think he can be great.

"It's kind of funny that everyone gets so surprised about Beck, because everyone in the NFL thought Beck was somewhere from the best to the fourth-best quarterback in that entire (2007) draft when he came out," Kyle Shanahan told me. "That's why he went in the second round. And when I evaluated them, I thought he was the best."

There was some issue last week where a report indicated Shanahan had wanted the Texans, for whom he was coaching at the time, to pick Beck with the 10th overall pick that year. That's not exactly what he told me. He said they'd just acquired Matt Schaub, but that if they hadn't and were looking for a quarterback at some point in that draft, he'd have recommended Beck, who went 40th overall to Miami. I don't think Shanahan would have made Beck the 10th pick in the draft, but he'd have encouraged his team to get in position to pick him.

"Anybody who watched him in college, he's a hell of a quarterback," Shanahan said. "If you look at his career, he really hasn't had an opportunity to show that he can or cannot do it. But everything we see in practice, everything I've seen with him, it's the exact same that he showed in college. He's a very good thrower. He can get rid of it quick -- very similar to Marc Bulger in his throwing motion, how he can just get rid of it at any time. He's got a lot of zip on his ball. He does have a strong arm. And when it comes to his mobility, he'll surprise people. He can move around in the pocket, he can outflank the defense, and he can move the chains with his feet, too."

This is why the Redskins want to see Beck, even having seen Grossman do well in his first crack at it. They believe Beck's athleticism brings an element that Grossman does not. What they don't know is whether Beck can handle the opportunity, since they don't think he's ever had it.

"He's very confident," Shanahan said. "He believes in himself, and he should, because he's a talented guy who should be a starting quarterback in the NFL. Now, we've got to see how he plays when the lights come on. We'll put him in the game and see how he handles the pressure of being the guy. If he can handle the pressure, we know he's capable from an athletic standpoint."

That's the word both Shanahans use when they talk about Beck -- "know," not "think." Kyle and Mike Shanahan project absolute confidence in their evaluation of Beck. They say the four games he started for the 2007 Dolphins -- a 1-15 team that ranks as one of the worst ever -- are a poor gauge.

"I've been doing this for a few years. I know people that can play," Mike Shanahan told me. "So I don't even worry about what people say. I know John Beck can play in this league. Why hasn't he played? Why hasn't he had a chance? I really don't care what the different thought processes are, but I know John can play in this league. He hasn't had a chance. Everybody needs a supporting cast, so we'll do the best we can to give him a good supporting cast -- him and Rex -- and give those guys a chance to compete."

Compete Beck will. We don't know how he'll do. We think we know, and the Shanahans say they think (nay, "know") we're wrong about him. What does Beck think? Well, he's waiting to find out, too.

"There's no secret to what I'm trying to do," Beck said. "I'm still on the road of trying to accomplish this thing. I'm still just working at this goal that I have, and it's work. Every day."

DE Stephen Bowen

Stephen Bowen's family expected soon

Just a week before the Redskins begin Week 1 preparations, defensive end Stephen Bowen has some good news to share: his wife and infant son will soon join him in Northern Virginia.

Bowen's wife, Tiffany, gave birth to twins on June 28. Both Skyler and Stephen III were born four months premature, and Skyler lived for only 10 days. For the past two months, Stephen III has lived in a Dallas hospital, receiving 24-hour care. Because he had to report to Redskins Park last month, Bowen has been living apart from his family.

"It takes a load off. I worry about him every day," Bowen said Tuesday. "Just him being premature, some days were good, some days were bad. But now he's starting to stabilize, so it takes a lot off."

Bowen said his wife, baby and 23-month old daughter, Trinity, will be relocating soon. Stephen III will be transferred to a Northern Virginia hospital, but Bowen is hopeful he'll be healthy enough to be released after a couple of weeks.

"I can't even put it into words how I'll feel," he said. "It's going to be a good feeling, though."

Stephen III was born at 24 weeks, and because Bowen reported to the Redskins in late July, Bowen had little contact with his new son.

"I held him once before I left, and he was still like, maybe two pounds," Bowen said. "It's going to be a big difference. He was real little. They have something called kangaroo care, where you try to create a bond with your child. I only got to do it once before I left, so I'm looking forward to spending a lot of time with him."

Stephen III now weighs more 4 1/2 pounds, Bowen said. The defensive end is eager to see the growth in person.

“I’ve been looking forward to it for the whole month,” Bowen said. “I’ve only seen pictures of him. My wife always tells me he’s changed a lot. So I’m looking forward to it.”

Tackle Jammal Brown

Gameday Q&A: Redskins RT Jammal Brown

Mike Jones
The Washington Post

When the Washington Redskins’ offensive line takes the field today against the Carolina Panthers, only one player – right tackle Jammal Brown – will remain as a lineman who was starting at this point last season.

Brown, who re-signed with the Redskins this summer, describes himself as much more comfortable in his second season with the Redskins.

In today’s Gameday Q&A – our Sunday feature where we sit down with a player and discuss anything from football, to hobbies, to childhood -- Brown talks a little O-line, his first love (baseball), fashion and sweatbands.

You’ve now got a year and change in this system under your belt. How has that helped you?

Very comfortable. Health-wise and just knowing the scheme and having the year under my belt helped out a lot. Everything’s coming second-nature to me, knowing the play calls and reading the defenses, it’s all easier for me.

What improvements do you, or the line as a whole, still need to make?

Staying with the plan on how we’re going to go out and play, guys understanding what they have to do play in and play out.

There’s been some shuffling on the line this week. How complicated can that be when you’re lining up in a new spot and next to a different guy than you normally do?

For the left side, there will be different guys playing over there, Will-Mont is playing the left side now and next to Sean. It’ll be a little different and can take a bit to get used to. But that’s what this week has been for, for building that chemistry. But it’s got to be done, and we’re doing it.

Growing up, when did you decide football was the sport for you?

Actually when I got to high school. I was always baseball and football at that point, and I really had to get my grades up so I could go to college and play football. So I had to let baseball go, let my summers go. So yeah, it was right about high school that I decided.

What position did you play in baseball?

I was a first basemen. I always played baseball. Baseball and soccer were my first sports, then I started playing football. I always loved playing baseball. I still love it. I'm a pretty good player, too.

What's your favorite team?

I always like watching Boston and St. Louis. I played against [St. Louis Cardinals outfielder] Matt Holliday in high school. We were both pretty good. But he made it, big, big time. But I played against him in high school and a bunch of players.

What kind of a player were you?

I was a power hitter. Could jack it over that right field fence. Good first baseman, had that reach, so it made it hard for guys to get base hits. I was a real good player. My junior year, playing for Senior States, I had 16 home runs in half a year. But I was sad I had to stop playing.

Was it a hard decision?

Not at all. Baseball's one of those sports where you've got to be better than just good, or even great. There are so many kids playing that sport and you really have to stand out. I felt like I was pretty good, but it takes forever to get there, to the Majors. Football was a faster track.

Were you always a big guy?

Kinda. I remember in eighth grade, I played some quarterback, some option quarterback. I was about 6-2, 220. Probably ninth and 10th grade, I grew to about 6-6. As a senior I was 325, and once I got to Oklahoma, they chopped all that off me.

Why did you pick Oklahoma?

My five visits were OU, Miami, Tennessee, Kentucky and Nebraska, and it just came down to Oklahoma. I just liked it there.

When you're not playing football, what do you like to do?

When I'm not playing football, I just relax, stay with myself, enjoy my kids, shop. I like fashion, clothes is my thing. It's kinda unfair, all the little guys get the good stuff, but I know some people in all the right places that can get me some pretty fly stuff. I stay in my Marc Jacob jeans, things like that. It's kinda my thing. A lot of us guys can by nice clothes, but I put a little spice in it.

Around here you wear sweatbands a lot. Is that fashion or need?

Sweatbands are my thing. I sleep in my sweatband. I don't like sweating, and don't like sweat getting in my face. I was actually talking to a company in San Diego about making a kind that you can put on under your helmet, to hold the sweat for you. But yeah, doing a walk-through out here, I've got my fingers taped, and I don't want to rub my dirty fingers in my eyes, so sweatbands save me.

So describe Jammal Brown in one sentence.

Really, I'm just a simple, ol' country boy from Oklahoma. That's me.

Shemar Woods
The Washington Post
August 17, 2011

The Redskins' offensive line has spent the last two weeks working to come together as one moving part.

And on the last day of training camp, the unit took another step toward improving its chemistry thanks to a wardrobe request from right tackle Jammal Brown after Tuesday morning's practice.

"I'm known for wearing the headband and I was like 'guys we're going with headbands during walkthrough today'," Brown said. "We're the line. We just want to be one. I didn't want to be a sore thumb sticking out."

Brown blended right in with his fellow offensive linemen, who sported headbands during Tuesday afternoon's walkthrough. Brown said he didn't know if his teammates would continue to wear the headbands for the remainder of the season, but did note that the headbands would not be worn underneath their helmets this season. That would be uncomfortable and could very well be considered an injury risk.

For a walkthrough without helmets, however, the headbands made the offensive line look like a unit.

"It might be something that we do a little bit more often, but really, it's just to keep the sweat out of our eyes," Brown said. "It looks sweet, though."

Defensive End Adam CarrikerGameday Q&A: Adam Carriker

By Mike Jones
The Washington Post
October 30, 2011

Six games into his second season with the Washington Redskins, defensive end Adam Carriker appears to be having a breakout year. The fifth-year pro has recorded 4.5 sacks, which ranks as a career high and has him tied with linebacker Brian Orakpo for first on the team.

Carriker spent much of last season re-acclimating himself to the NFL after a year on injured reserve in 2009. Now he appears to have regained the form that made him the 13th overall pick of the 2007 draft.

The subject of this week's Gameday Q&A, Carriker talks about his rebound from injury, the mental adjustment required for playing end in the 3-4 defense and his life off the field.

You're off to a good start this season. What's the key to your success so far?

"I feel good. Second half of last year I started getting into the comfort zone and it's just transitioned into this year. I'm just more comfortable. I don't feel like I'm thinking too much, I feel like I know what the play is going to be a lot of the time, and I can just go play football."

Before last season, you hadn't played in the 3-4 during your pro career. Did you have some experience in the system in college?

"Nope. I hadn't played it ever. Everybody thinks I played in the 3-4 in college. But I didn't play it at Nebraska, didn't play it in St. Louis. Last year was the first year."

Talk about the difference in your role as a 3-4 end compared to a lineman in the 4-3.

"It's extremely different. Even the individual drills we do. I've been playing football since middle school, and I'm like, 'I've never done any of these drills before.' We're doing something we've never done before. It just takes a while for you to get used to it both physically and mentally. You're not penetrating upfield, you're not trying to get into the backfield. You're more reading and moving sideways rather than vertical."

So, it's a less aggressive approach, but not exactly passive either, right?

"Right. When we're in our base 3-4, for us, it's not so much an aggressive mindset. It's more so read and react. He goes left, I go right. He goes right, I go left. So it's not, I'm penetrating to get into the backfield. It's definitely not as aggressive, but at the same, if a guy's coming out at you, you have to be aggressive then, because you can't get pushed back. Your job is to take on take on the double teams, your job is to hold the block so the linebackers can run around."

You started every game as a rookie in 2007, then battled some injuries. How good does it feel to have all that behind you and to be able to consistently be on the field?

"It feels good. My rookie year I played well, second year I was riddled with injuries, third year I got put on IR, so when I got a chance to come here, it was an awesome opportunity."

What's something that not a lot of people know about Adam Carriker?

"Hmmm, well everybody knows about the wrestling thing. (Carriker is an avid pro wrestling fan). Another thing, I love four-wheelers. I grew up four-wheeling. I don't get to do it very much anymore, because I don't live near my parents. But we had four-wheelers, we had a boat. I just love doing outdoorsy stuff. I can't do any water skiing or snow skiing right now just because of what I do, but when I retire, I'm going to live on the mountain, I'm going to live on the lake.

"We just built a house and it's on a lake, so I bought a boat. I drive that around, take the wife out for her to go water skiing. I do do the knee-boarding, because I feel like that's pretty safe. If I fall off, it's maybe foot either way. Just doing that kind of stuff, hanging out with the kids. My son [Jacob] is 2, he loves the boat. He can be irate and you put him on the boat and he is so solemn and quiet. He sees the boat and it's 'Boat, boat, boat!' He loves it."

Does your son understand what you do for a living?

"I've never really told him, but I think his mom has explained it. Any time football comes on TV, I can be sitting right next to him even and he says 'Daddy tackle! Daddy tackle!' We have a little Redskins blowup tackling dummy and he'll go in there and tackle it on the trampoline and yells, 'Daddy tackle!' He gets it for right now."

What do you want to do with your life post-football?

"Everybody asks me and I never have an answer. It's funny because growing up, everyone would say, 'What are you going to be when you grow up?' and they wouldn't let me say, 'professional athlete,' because they'd say, 'You're not going to make it!' So I never had an answer. Even in Nebraska, my first two years, I did general studies and then it came to my third year and I had to declare, and I said, 'Dad, I don't know what I'm going to choose.' And he said, 'Just go business. You really have no clue? Well just go business because the money's always there.' It's still the same thing. When I'm done playing sports, I don't know what I'm going to do. I'll probably join rec. leagues, flag football leagues, tennis. Something sports. It's all I know."

Former Rams first-rounder Adam Carriker has revitalized his career with Redskins

October 1, 2011

Currently on the Carriker family's digital video recorder is the three-hour telecast of the Washington Redskins' Aug. 18 preseason game against the Indianapolis Colts. Adam Carriker did not play in that forgettable exhibition because of severe blisters on his heels, but his wife, Angie, recorded it anyway, as she always does. During the broadcast, Adam participated in a sideline TV interview. His smiling face was shown up close to the extreme delight of his 2-year-old son, Jacob, who the Carrikers call "Junior." He jumped up from his little chair and shuffled to the TV, stopping with his face only an inch from the screen.

"Any time he's upset or mad, she'll turn on the Colts game and go to my interview," Adam said. "That calms him right down. We can't delete that thing ever."

Imagine that. Adam Carriker's football career is a source of joy and calm.

It wasn't always that way. Eighteen months ago he was disillusioned. The St. Louis Rams, who drafted him 13th overall in 2007, had deployed him as a nose guard, a position foreign to him and one for which his talents were not best suited. His play suffered, and he felt the weight of unfulfilled potential and expectations.

Recognizing the failure, the Rams traded him to the Redskins in April 2010 and effectively gave him a fresh start. Now Carriker is a productive left defensive end in the Redskins' 3-4 defense. Sunday's game against his former team will be his 20th consecutive start for Washington. Finally, he has found a good fit.

"I knew what happened there was B.S., so when I came here I expected to do this," Carriker said. "And it feels good."

Carriker, 27, was one of the nation's best defensive ends at the University of Nebraska. He had 20.5 sacks during his four seasons, which ranked sixth in school history. Big 12 coaches named him the conference's defensive lineman of the year following his senior season. He foresaw a professional career as a big-time playmaker.

The Rams drafted him high but played him on the interior line as a nose guard. Instead of changing games with sacks, he consistently faced double teams.

"If I had any criticism of the St. Louis organization, it's that they put players out of position a lot," said Redskins safety Oshiomogho Atogwe, who teamed with Carriker in St. Louis for Carriker's entire tenure there. "With Adam, they drafted him and made him play 3-technique or nose tackle, and that's not what he's naturally gifted at doing, so he's not going to realize his full potential."

Carriker totaled only two sacks in his first two seasons. Then he missed all of 2009 with a shoulder injury. And when any first-round pick is unproductive and injured, the organization and fans begin to consider him a bust.

"One guy labels me and all of a sudden the bandwagon effect came on," Carriker said.

Asked to elaborate, he declined. Those details aren't important to him anymore.

The clouds parted on that morning two Aprils ago when he walked into Rams coach Steve Spagnuolo's office and saw general manager Billy Devaney waiting for him with a plane ticket to Washington.

He joined the Redskins under defensive coordinator Jim Haslett, who held the same position with St. Louis when Carriker was drafted. Rather than continue with the nose guard experiment, though, Haslett learned from the experience and slotted him at defensive end.

"He's a big, strong, physical guy that can 2-gap and eat up space," Haslett said. "Obviously he fits in this scheme better than he does that scheme."

Carriker's anger didn't dissipate immediately, though. He left St. Louis with a tarnished football reputation. That bred resentment.

"Anybody that knows Adam knows he will work harder than anybody on the team," Angie Carriker said. "I really think that's what got him through it. Like, 'I'm gonna prove you wrong. You made a mistake.'"

So Carriker set out to restore his name. You can find him most days inside the weight room at Redskins Park. He's one of the team's heaviest lifters, capable of bench pressing upwards of 500 pounds.

That helps him on the outside of the Redskins' defensive front. His responsibilities including setting the edge in the run game, keeping offensive linemen from releasing to Washington's linebackers and rushing the passer in some nickel situations.

He still isn't the overpowering pass-rushing end he was at Nebraska, but he has an improved outlook now.

"Sometimes I'll take a chance to try to make a play, but for the most part I try to do my responsibility, and I think the coaches like that and respect that," Carriker said. "They know I'm going to be in my gap. They know I'm not going to get pushed around. That left side, that's where all the runs are at. You need a big guy like me."

As for the Rams organization, Carriker decided that he needed to move on after the Redskins played them last September.

That Week 3 contest was a special source of motivation for him. Sunday's game, he insists, is against any old opponent.

"Last year, I was pretty angry and upset," Carriker said. "Now I look back on it, I actually wish them the best in every game except for Sunday. I think they did me a favor. It wasn't working out, and they put me in a much better spot personally. Maybe I should send them a thank you after Sunday."

Nose Tackle Barry Cofield

Now, Redskins' Barry Cofield gets to see how the other half lives

The Washington Times
September 8, 2011

Barry Cofield played against the Washington Redskins 10 times as a member of the New York Giants. After all but one of those games he retreated to a victorious locker room. Dominance in this division rivalry is all he knows.

Close games, lopsided games, meaningless games, games with playoff implications - it hasn't mattered. The Giants own the Redskins.

“When I was there, we respected this team,” the Redskins’ new nose tackle said. “I’ve heard some things to the contrary, and I don’t think that’s true. When I was there and we had success, it was because we respected this team and we came out and played hard.”

And played better. Much better.

So if the Redskins are to take a significant step forward in coach Mike Shanahan’s second season, they must reverse their fortunes against the Giants, starting with Sunday’s season opener at FedEx Field.

“They’ve ran the ball on us, and we haven’t run the ball on them,” safety Reed Doughty said. “It’s pretty simple. I’m hoping that the way things are progressing, the preseason this year, that we can go out and do those things in the game. They’ve had our number. There’s no other way to look at it.”

Stats from the past 10 meetings tell a clear story, as Doughty suggests. In outscoring the Redskins by an average of 11 points, New York has bludgeoned the Redskins on the ground on both sides of the ball.

The Giants have outrushed Washington by an average of 140.9 yards to 93.2. New York has surpassed 100 rushing yards in eight of the 10 games; the Redskins have hit that mark only twice.

In the Giants’ 31-7 rout last December, they finished with 197 rushing yards on 36 carries.

“We know they want to run the football,” linebacker London Fletcher said. “I think they averaged about 30-35 rushes a [game] last year. They have a great defensive front - so obviously it started up front on both sides of the ball. We’ve just got to stop the run and get them in third-and-long situations.”

This could be the year, though, the Redskins stop getting pushed around up front on offense. Cofield defected to D.C. during free agency, and two of the other defensive linemen who started for New York against Washington last season - ends Osi Umenyiora and Justin Tuck - might miss the game with injuries.

The Giants’ injury woes also include cornerback Terrell Thomas (torn ACL) and cornerback Prince Amakamura (fractured foot), their first-round pick. First-string middle linebacker Jonathan Goff suffered a season-ending knee injury in practice this week.

Redskins offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan doesn’t see an advantage there, though. He’s wary of the Giants’ reserves, including defensive end Jason Pierre-Paul, their 2010 first-round pick, who had a sack against Washington last season.

“I don’t see them much different,” Shanahan said.

Cofield would take extreme pleasure in beating the Giants even though he hasn’t suffered their oppression like many of his new teammates.

He started all but two games since New York drafted him in the fourth round five years ago. But when it came time for a new contract, Washington made a better commitment.

Cofield has buried any bitterness about his former employer.

“I tried to focus more on the excitement of coming to Washington,” he said. “The only thing I miss in New York are my friends, the relationships that I built. As far as the football aspect of it ... I look forward to playing those guys, and I hope we beat those guys.

He wants to be the one smiling, though. He has been part of this rivalry long enough to know what a win would signify for his new team.

Tight End Chris Cooley

Amy Shipley, Mike Jones
The Washington Post
October 4, 2011

When his trainer advised him to try a popular but unproven healing therapy for his injured Achilles’ tendon last year, Washington Redskins safety LaRon Landry did not hesitate. He wanted to get back to work.

It did not concern him that the recommended treatment, platelet-rich plasma (PRP) therapy, lacks scientific validation, has shown mixed results in a limited number of studies and involves drawing a dose of one’s own blood and reinjecting it.

Landry now evangelizes like a PRP prophet. Since using the treatment for three different injuries, he’s been spreading the word to teammates.

“I’m happy I went with it,” Landry said. “A lot of guys ask me about it, and when guys get hurt, I try to put them onto the PRP because I think it’s something they should be knowledgeable of if they’re trying to recover.”

Landry’s attitude is shared by increasing numbers of injured athletes in locker rooms and clubhouses nationwide, who are grasping at non-surgical options for fast healing. For men whose livelihoods depend on staying healthy, the occasional, and widely publicized, PRP success stories have caused the popularity of the procedure to far outpace the research behind it, experts say.

Published studies on the procedure are limited. One of the earliest, co-authored by Allan K. Mishra, a Menlo Park, Calif., orthopedist, suggests that PRP is effective at treating tennis elbow, but a later one concluded that it did not markedly help rotator cuff injuries.

The available research does not provide complete clarity, according to doctors, because no two PRP procedures are exactly the same. Doctors say they are not only uncertain about when to administer it, but precisely how to do it for optimal effect.

“There’s tremendous variation among different types of PRP,” said Scott Rodeo, who participated in the rotator cuff study and will be the team physician for the U.S. swimming Olympic team at the 2012 Summer Games in London. “My PRP is different than your PRP, because my blood is different than yours. All of those things add up to such variability it’s hard to analyze the data to get a handle on it.”

‘The pioneering beginning’

Athletes, however, seem to care little about such details. In the last few months alone, a host of players have tried PRP, including major league pitchers Jose Contreras of the Philadelphia Phillies, Daisuke Matsuzaka and Bobby Jenks of the Boston Red Sox, Brett Anderson of the Oakland Athletics and Jesse Carlson of the Toronto Blue Jays, as well as Wesley Matthews of the NBA’s Portland Trail Blazers.

“The athletes are the ones at the pioneering beginning, trying new things to accelerate healing,” Mishra said. “Athletes are dissatisfied with other options presented to them.”

Landry believed PRP therapy helped his Achilles’ tendon so much he also used it when he injured his shoulder and hamstring. Teammates Chris Cooley and Brandon Banks recently sought out PRP injections for their injured knees.

Some athletes are turning to even more unproven and newfangled therapies involving the use of adult stem cells; Indianapolis Colts quarterback Peyton Manning reportedly traveled to Europe for treatment on his neck that was not approved in the United States.

New York Yankees pitcher Bartolo Colon received stem-cell therapy in the Dominican Republic in 2010 that appeared to yield huge dividends but also sparked a Major League Baseball investigation.

Unlike stem-cell treatment and other methods that remain on the fringe in pro sports, PRP has become nearly as available as cortisone shots. Developed well over a decade ago, the treatment first garnered mainstream attention when Pittsburgh Steelers wide receiver Hines Ward used it to help him play in the Super Bowl in 2009. Its use spread quickly after that.

inShare Gallery

Landry traveled to Arizona for his PRP, but some teams now offer the procedure in-house. Even noted sports surgeon James Andrews — Banks's physician — acknowledged that his Birmingham, Ala., clinic has in the last year begun offering PRP, though only in certain cases. Andrews does not personally perform the therapy.

"It definitely has a future in trying to get certain injuries to heal, and to heal with a better response," Andrews said. "The problem is we don't know quite when to use it, and don't know the different injuries that will respond best to it. All of it is pretty much anecdotal."

Virtually no risk factors

Doctors and athletes say they are attracted to PRP because of its apparent safety, simplicity and lack of side effects. Blood is removed from the injured region and spun in a centrifuge to concentrate the platelets. When reinjected into the body, the concentrated platelets release growth factors that theoretically should promote faster healing. Because patients are receiving their own blood, risk factors are virtually eliminated.

Landry said his Arizona-based trainer persuaded him to use PRP therapy last year. He actually ignored the advice at first, trying to play through the pain. That decision, he said, made the injury worse. After he was placed on injured reserve, he eventually traveled to Arizona for the PRP treatment — and immediately became a believer. This summer, when he aggravated his right hamstring, he didn't waste any time.

"The PRP doesn't work for everybody; it's more so trial and error," he said. But "I loved it. . . . [It] really healed my Achilles. And my hamstring."

Atlanta Braves left-handed reliever George Sherrill grew frustrated with nagging elbow pain that left him unable to lob a baseball from the pitcher's mound to the catcher a day after facing any hitters in games. But unlike Landry, he did not have to seek out the treatment. He received the PRP therapy from one of Atlanta's team physicians. Earlier in the season, teammate Kris Medlen also received a PRP injection.

"The [team] doctors brought it to me," Sherrill said before a game against the Florida Marlins in Miami last month. "They said it was an avenue to take. I said, 'If it will mean me throwing again this year, getting into the playoffs and, on a personal side, showing people I would be healthy next year, I'll give it a whirl.'"

Sherrill isn't sure the therapy made any difference at all; he speculated the rest he got before and after the procedure might have been responsible for the small benefit he noticed. Cooley, however, said each time he received it he felt 50 percent better.

Sherrill noted there also was an important side effect in his case.

"It was like this, after," Sherrill said, holding up his left arm and shaking it violently. "I had cortisone shots before, and this was 50 times worse than that. [A cortisone shot] feels like you stuck your arm over a stove. This felt like a truck ran over my elbow."

Negative press

Another downside is the negative publicity PRP has attracted when it has been abused. Canadian doctor Anthony Galea, who in July pleaded guilty to bringing misbranded drugs across the U.S. border, was accused by his personal assistant of mixing human growth hormone (HGH), a drug banned by nearly every sports league in the world, with the blood of some of his athlete patients before reinjecting it as part of the PRP therapy. Galea treated a host of prominent athletes, including golfer Tiger Woods, the Yankees' Alex Rodriguez and Redskins wide receiver Santana Moss.

Major League Baseball investigated Colon's treatment for a similar reason: The doctor who administered it had been known for using HGH as part of healing treatments.

PRP therapy has flummoxed the World Anti-Doping Agency, which originally banned it for intra-muscular use but lifted the ban this year — saying it did not have enough evidence to conclude that PRP aided performance in any way.

The key for players, of course, is whether it helps them heal.

"It's a neat treatment," Cooley said. "I can't tell you the ultimate benefits to it. No one can. It's still new. But I did feel better. . . . I've now had two or three guys around the league call me for advice on PRP and the effects of it."

Davis finally living up to potential at tight end

Fred Davis knew he had set the tone for the afternoon with his first reception. The trick now is having that afternoon set the tone for the season.

The fourth-year tight end went as high as his 6-foot-4 frame would take him to snag Rex Grossman's first-quarter throw Sunday, pulling it down and holding on for a 23-yard gain. The catch was a big part of the Redskins' first scoring drive of the season in a 28-14 win over the Giants.

"For me, a tight end, it's that first catch," Davis said. "When you first get that first ball, now it's time to go. I think that's what it was for me."

When Davis walked off the field with five catches and a career-best 105 yards, he had in his possession the kind of performance long sought from the 2008 second-round draft pick, though not completely unexpected in a contract year.

"It wasn't anything that we didn't see before," Redskins coach Mike Shanahan said. "When a person gets the opportunity to play and start and he makes some big plays like Fred did, he took advantage of an opportunity showing people in the NFL that he belongs."

Because Davis' best season (48 receptions, 509 yards, six TDs) came with Chris Cooley injured during the latter half of 2009, last weekend also was a tantalizing peek at the potential of playing two top tight ends both at their best. But Davis' emergence isn't expected to come at the expense of his eight-year veteran teammate, who has heard just about enough of the argument over which one of them should start.

"To have guys make plays on offense is what makes you a good offense," Cooley said. "For both of us to be in the game, which we both talk about a lot and both feel should be in the game making plays, is going to be huge for this offense."

Having Davis and Cooley on the field at the same time allows Shanahan to stay committed to the run while also forcing the defense to choose whether to add extra protection against the pass.

"We create an advantage because with us both in you have to decide if you want to play us in a base defense, if you want to play us in a nickel defense," Cooley said. "We'll start creating a lot of big pass plays if people are going to play us in base."

And that's where Davis comes into play. Having shed 15 pounds in the offseason (he's listed at 258), he's as quick and athletic as a receiver when he lines up wide. But the numbers advantages come inside, too, where he made key catches against the Giants.

"I wanted to be able to run all day and be able to make plays down the seam," Davis said. "I see tight ends make plays down the seam, and in this offense, you can make a lot of plays at the tight end position, so I just wanted to benefit from it."

LANDOVER, Md.

--It's taken the better part of three years, but Washington Redskins tight end Fred Davis feels he finally has what it takes to have a breakout year.

The 6-foot-4 tight end reportedly weighed in at 243 pounds, according to coach Mike Shanahan--down from the 260 pounds he carried throughout last season.

"I just feel like in this offense, you don't need to be that big tight end," Davis said. "We do a lot of zone scheme running, and if you've got good hand placement and a really strong inside presence, you'll still be able to run routes.

"I feel better this way. I feel like I'm going to be able to run routes that I normally could still run, but I just feel more agile, elusive, quicker. I feel quicker out of my breaks. I just feel good, really good."

In the Redskins' preseason opener against Pittsburgh last night, Davis started for Chris Cooley, who was sidelined after having fluid drained from his left knee a week ago. He had just one catch for 11 yards, but dropped another that could have gone for 21 yards.

"Fred's been doing an excellent job," Shanahan said. "He almost looks like a wide receiver. He's got the type of body to carry 260, but he's even better at the weight he's currently at."

Shanahan said Cooley saw a specialist about the left knee Wednesday, which he said is "just sore." Cooley tore the meniscus in the knee last season.

"He'll miss, I believe, a couple weeks, and we'll keep our fingers crossed that he'll be back, Shanahan said. "When will it be? I can't tell you."

Davis, who caught 72 passes for 852 yards and nine touchdowns in his first three seasons combined, is looking to nearly double those numbers in 2011. He has set eight to 10 touchdowns and 800 yards as a benchmark this fall.

"I want to be a starter in this league," Davis said, noting that his rookie contract expires after this season. "It's not my mentality to back somebody else up the rest of my life. To me, this is going to set me up to be somewhere, whether it be here or somewhere else. I want to be here, and I want to make sure to play to the best of my ability so that I can do that."

ONE GRAHAM BETTER THAN THE OTHER

Shayne Graham, brought in to challenge Graham Gano for the kicking role, missed both of his field goal attempts.

The 10-year veteran out of Virginia Tech toed a 29-yarder wide left with 5:37 remaining in the first quarter, then, after the Redskins drove 55 yards with 1:35 remaining, Graham missed a 48-yard attempt wide right at the end of the second quarter.

Gano, the Redskins' kicker last season, made all four of his attempts. He converted a 32-yard field goal for the Redskins with 4:50 left in the third and made two others in the fourth: a 34-yarder with 9:53 left and a 45-yarder he hit off the left upright and in with 2:33 remaining.

"You don't wish bad on anyone in any competition," Gano said. "It was unfortunate to see the night he had, but he'll bounce back. He's a veteran."

THIS AND THAT

In addition to Cooley, free safety Oshiomogho Atogwe (hamstring) did not play, with Chris Horton starting in his place. Also out of action were running back Ryan Torain (left hand) and right guard Artis Hicks (concussion). Cornerback Josh Wilson appeared to injure his right ankle midway through the second quarter, but he missed just one play before returning to the field. Linebacker Perry Riley injured his left ankle late in the fourth quarter and did not return. Aldrick Robinson, a sixth-round pick out of SMU, bobbled both of his punt returns in the second half. Brandon Banks, the Redskins' primary returner, had an 18-yard punt return in the first quarter and a 58-yard kickoff return in the second quarter.

Safety Reed Doughty

The Washington Post
September 8, 2011

Reed Doughty tried to list them all. Of course, there was Adam Archuleta and Sean Taylor. Omar Stoutmire and Pierson Prioleau. Add Oshiomogho Atogwe and DeJon Gomes to the list now, too. In all, he could barely rattle off half their names.

From Archuleta and Taylor to Atogwe and LaRon Landry, Doughty has played with 17 safeties since joining the Washington Redskins. With few exceptions, most didn't hang around Washington for very long.

"That sounds like 25 years worth of guys," Doughty said. "It's only been six."

Doughty has been a mainstay — and with good reason. As has been the case so many times in the past few years, when a player goes down, Doughty is ready to step up.

"That's what they signed me to do," said Doughty, who re-signed with the team last month. "That's what I knew I was coming back for."

Landry says he'll miss Sunday's season opener against the New York Giants, which means Doughty will get the start at strong safety. Rarely pegged as the preseason starter, Doughty always seems to find his way into the lineup. Last year, he also was No. 2 on the depth chart but started nine games total, most after Landry went on injured reserve with an injured Achilles' tendon.

Doughty isn't a physical specimen like Landry and doesn't have the superstar credentials Taylor had. Yet he has been an important cog on the team. He has survived two coaching changes and has been part of the defense as long as anyone (Rocky McIntosh and Kedric Golston were fellow 2006 draft picks).

"A guy like Reed, you don't miss until you don't have him," linebacker London Fletcher said.

Doughty, 28, will be lined up Sunday in the defensive backfield alongside Atogwe, who will be making his debut as a Redskin. While that tandem isn't exactly what Redskins fans have been salivating about for the past several months, it's going to be at least one more week before Atogwe can be paired with Landry.

"We're all eager to have LaRon back on the field because he makes us a better defense," Atogwe said. "When he's ready to get on the field, it's going to be something to see."

Doughty has been practicing with the starters since training camp opened. Though Landry's hamstring injury has limited him in practice, Coach Mike Shanahan has yet to formally rule him out of Sunday's game.

"It's frustrating for everybody," defensive coordinator Jim Haslett said. "He's a heck of a football player. We'd love to have him out there. Obviously, he's had a couple setbacks. When he's ready to go, he'll get out there."

But coaches say they're confident in Doughty. And like so many players on the defensive side of the ball, Doughty thinks he'll show huge improvements in his second year in Haslett's system.

"Just more comfortable," he said. "I can feel it. It feels second nature. I'm paying attention to what the offense is doing, what the reads are doing — not figuring out exactly my technique and where I'm supposed to end up. I'm definitely more comfortable."

Doughty's game film might not blow away pro scouts from opposing teams, but Redskins coaches rave about his work ethic and his eagerness to learn. Doughty was a free agent after the 2010 season, and Haslett said coaches made clear to the team's front office they hoped Doughty would be re-signed. With Landry still recovering from the Achilles' injury, bringing Doughty back was a must, and the team told Doughty before the lockout that he would be targeted for a return.

"He's been able to fill a number of voids for us," Fletcher said. "He started at strong safety for us, he's started at free safety, he's come in to play some nickel linebacker for us, he does a lot on special teams. You can't say enough about him. He definitely plays a big role in our defense."

With Landry expected to be sidelined and free safety Kareem Moore stuck on the physically-unable-to-perform list for the season's first six weeks, the Redskins are thin at safety. Aside from Atogwe and Doughty, the only other healthy safety on the roster is Gomes, the team's fifth-round draft pick this spring. The Nebraska product is raw, but coaches were impressed with his preseason progress.

"Some things don't come fast right off the bat," Haslett said. "But once he sees it once, he's right in tune with everybody."

The team could slide cornerback Kevin Barnes to safety in a pinch. But for the most part, the team is relying on Atogwe and Doughty to carry the load.

It's not how the Redskins imagined starting the season, but it's also why re-signing Doughty was important: For the past five years, he's been the team's most reliable contingency plan.

Linebacker London Fletcher

Jason Reid
Washington Post
November 11, 2011

Don't count on London Fletcher quitting. And he has no intention of letting anyone else give in. Wherever the Washington Redskins' latest slide takes them, their leader guarantees that they will at least fight.

Even at 36, the inside linebacker still only has one speed. As another wasted season unfolds around him, Fletcher won't compromise, which, once again, should remind Redskins management just how much he means to the team.

In the struggling organization, Fletcher's contributions are unmatched. He's one of few guys (the only one?) on the team with universal credibility. He continues to show that Washington needs more people like him — especially now.

The Redskins have lost four straight and five of their past six games. Coach Mike Shanahan and his offensive coordinator son, Kyle, are under fire for Washington's ineptitude on offense. Essentially, Washington's improved defense must pitch shutouts for the team to win. Defensive players are feeling the pressure, and cracks have already shown.

The imbalance could threaten to tear apart the locker room if not, in part, for the presence of a 14-year veteran who wouldn't let things get to that point.

“When you have a guy like Fletch, who guys respect for what he says [in the locker room] and the way he backs it up [on the field], you don't worry about that kind of stuff,” cornerback DeAngelo Hall, who shares defensive captain duties with Fletcher, said recently.

“You know when times are rough, you can count on Fletch to do the right thing. He's gonna think about what's best for the team. The whole team.”

It's a familiar role and one Fletcher performs well.

The offense derailed the team after its promising 3-1 start. The injuries on offense are part of the problem. But Mike Shanahan's major mistakes account for the majority of the mess. Some Redskins employees are still scratching their heads about Shanahan's decision to stake his reputation on two incapable quarterbacks — Rex Grossman and John Beck — and wondering how long it will take to improve at the game's most important position. Also, during two cycles of the draft and free agency, Shanahan picked most of the players on the 53-man roster.

There's only one person to question about supposed personnel deficiencies.

On sports-talk radio and Internet message boards, defensive coordinator Jim Haslett is taking heat because the Redskins have given up a lot of yardage during the losing streak, but "defensively, we've done a lot of good things, so I am frustrated," Fletcher said Monday while we spoke privately at Redskins Park. "It does upset me that we're not perceived to be as good a defense as we are.

"It bothers me, from the standpoint of the record, that the perception is out there. Sometimes the record doesn't show what you've done."

At first glance, the statistics indicate the Redskins' defense, 13th overall in the NFL in yardage allowed, is only an above-average group. Dig deeper, however, and you learn the Redskins are among the best at disrupting quarterbacks, ranking third in the league with 25 sacks, three behind the top-ranked New York Giants. Washington is tied for fourth with 10 forced fumbles. It's seventh in points allowed at 19.8 per game.

Clearly, if blame must be assessed, the offense has more explaining to do, "but as a defense, we can't look at it like that," Fletcher said. "Whatever we've done, whatever we're gonna do, to try to help the offense, we just have to do more.

"Our mind-set always has to be that. Whether that means giving the offense short fields, creating more turnovers, not giving up the big plays . . . or even field goals. Let's not even give those up. No field goals. If that's what we have to do, then that's what we have to do."

Keeping cool while shouldering so much isn't easy. Fletcher briefly lost it during the embarrassing loss to Buffalo on Oct. 30, blasting strong safety LaRon Landry on the sideline after his blown coverage resulted in a touchdown pass.

Fletcher and Landry overcame the incident, which served to remind Fletcher about "remaining together in the locker room regardless of what everyone else says about you out there. Regardless of the opinions out there, you can't have that divide. You have to stay tight."

Against Buffalo, Fletcher had one of his finest performances in five seasons with the Redskins: a game-high 19 tackles and an interception in the end zone. He played despite being slowed because of a hamstring injury, extending his consecutive games streak, now at 216.

Although Fletcher could become a free agent after the season, he would prefer to finish what he started here. He came to help restore the Redskins to prominence, and they're getting closer on defense.

Despite this season's problems, Fletcher remains upbeat about the Redskins' future. He sees some encouraging signs. But someone has to keep them united. Fletcher has already raised his hand.

Week in and week out, Fletcher remains steady force amid storm

Jay Skurski

The Washington Times

October 30, 2011

TORONTO — London Fletcher has been around the NFL long enough to know that games like Sunday's are going to happen.

That's why he took a calm, measured approach to his postgame session with the media following the Washington Redskins' 23-0 loss to the Buffalo Bills at Rogers Centre.

"I think everybody's frustrated we've lost three consecutive games," the 14th year linebacker said. "We haven't played well enough to win any of the games."

Fletcher might be the only one who can't say that about himself after Sunday's effort. Facing his former team, he turned in one of the most inspired performances on either side of the ball, racking up 20 tackles (12 solo), a half sack, two quarterback hits, an interception and a pass defended. He now has 43 tackles in the Redskins' seven games.

For a player who was questionable to play because of a hamstring injury, it was just the bounce-back performance he needed following a miserable showing in a Week 7 loss to Carolina.

"He played phenomenal," fellow linebacker Brian Orakpo said. "Fletch is a leader of this team. He played a great game against his former team."

Fletcher spent five seasons with the Bills from 2002 to 2006. Despite starting all 80 games during that stretch, Buffalo let him go after the '06 season, believing his best football was behind him.

He has shown during his first four seasons in Washington (at least 87 tackles in each) that's not the case. That he played Sunday after dealing with an injury all week should come as no surprise - he appeared in his 215th straight game and made his 170th straight start.

The filled stat sheets mean little after a loss, however.

"Defensively, we don't want to give up touchdowns," he said. "I think we had good practices, good preparation, but it takes more than just that. That's the good foundation you need in order to give yourself a chance to be successful on Sundays. Hopefully it just carries over on game day. It didn't happen for us [Sunday.]"

Fletcher had his rough moments, too. He was in coverage on both of the touchdown passes caught by Bills tight end Scott Chandler. Quarterback Ryan Fitzpatrick floated the ball over Fletcher's head in the first quarter for a 20-yard touchdown. On the Bills' first drive of the second half, Chandler beat Fletcher on a post route for another touchdown, this one gave the Bills a commanding 20-0 lead.

After that third-quarter play, the Fox television cameras caught Fletcher having an animated discussion with cornerback DeAngelo Hall on the sideline.

Fletcher, though, refused to point any fingers after the game.

"I wouldn't agree that my teammates didn't play with passion. The score can be taken or misconstrued by guys' effort. I don't think anybody's out there not giving effort," he said. "That's not the case. They made more plays than us, and that's pretty much the bottom line."

"I don't know what was going on, but it's just frustration. I think guys care. Guys want to win and want to do well so when things aren't going right tempers can flare. Especially in a game like this, competition and emotions run high. That just comes with it," defensive lineman Barry Cofield said.

Fletcher stopped short of calling the loss rock bottom for the reeling Redskins.

"I think we can bounce back from it," he said. "It's going to take effort from everybody. Everybody has to play better."

Bills' Jackson, 'Skins' Fletcher share bond

Small college roots a source of motivation

Buffalo News
October 27, 2011

Almost daily, red, white and blue T-shirts paying homage to Fred Jackson pop up around the Buffalo Bills' locker room. The front of the shirt reads "Jackson 22" while the back gives a nod to Jackson's Division III roots: "Reppin' The Nation D3: Pledge Your Allegiance."

The same T-shirt can easily be made in burgundy, gold and white for London Fletcher, the Washington Redskins' middle linebacker, who like Jackson was an unearthed gem from the NCAA's lowest, and often ignored, division of football.

"I have to think about it everyday, it's what motivates me to be here," said Jackson, who earned All-American honors at Iowa's Coe College. "It's something that I try and reflect on as much as possible. It's one of those things that keep me motivated out here."

A product of Division II Tuskegee, Drayton Florence said a few weeks ago, "big school, small school, I don't think it makes a difference," in terms of success on the pro level. He probably had players like Jackson and Fletcher in mind.

Jackson and Fletcher were underrated and overlooked, perhaps because their journeys began on the Division III level. But Jackson is a legitimate MVP candidate while Fletcher, the former Bills linebacker, is again on pace to eclipse the 100-tackle mark, something he's accomplished every year since the NFL started recording the stat in 2001.

"When you come into the league as a Division III player you come in with a chip on your shoulder knowing that they're always trying to replace you, and they don't think you're good enough," Fletcher said. "They don't really know the full story of why you may have ended up at the level that you played at. There's always a reason why the Division III players defiantly play with a chip on their shoulder."

Fletcher is a 5-foot-10, 245-pound linebacker playing in a profession that covets athletes four inches taller and 20 pounds heavier. Sports Illustrated once named him the "best player never to be selected to the Pro Bowl", an honor he had missed despite making more tackles than anyone in the last decade. The oversight has been corrected the last two seasons with Fletcher being named to the Pro Bowl.

In 2006, Fletcher's last season in Buffalo before he signed with Washington as a free agent, the Redskins ranked 31st in total defense. But they ranked in the top 10 during his first three seasons in D.C.

When the Bills host the Redskins in Toronto on Sunday, Fletcher, despite a sore hamstring, will likely play in his 215th consecutive game.

"I'm not sure if [the Bills] thought I didn't have any more years left in me or not," said Fletcher, who played at John Carroll in his hometown of Cleveland. "It worked out where I ended up coming to Washington and I've been able to play another five more seasons and still playing at a high level."

Fletcher was a mentor to Jackson when he was signed to the Bills' practice squad in 2006.

"I thought Fred did a good job," Fletcher said. "He was just on the scout team when I was there. I think maybe my last year he was on the active roster. I'm not sure how many carries he actually got, but he did a good job of giving us great looks in practice."

Jackson was already three years removed from Coe College and worked his way up through the pass-happy world of indoor football before the Bills invited him for a tryout. With 601 yards, Jackson is the league's sixth-leading rusher and is tied for second in rushing TDs by a running back with six, which trails only the eight scored by Minnesota's Adrian Peterson.

"Going to a Division III school, you're not going to get a lot of workouts," said Jackson, who was a 5-foot-8, 140-pound backup tailback in high school. "I went to a not too relatively known Division III school so that makes it tough. ... When I got my first start the first guy I played against was London Fletcher. I've always had a great amount of respect for him being he's a Division III player as well. He was one of the guys I used to talk to a lot when I first got here."

They talked about their path to the NFL, approaching the job as if getting shipped to the practice squad remains a possibility. Yet more of Jackson's teammates are reppin' the D3 nation. Corey McIntyre has one and so does Terrence McGee. Stevie Johnson walks around with the sleeves cut off his.

"I think the thing is with the NFL, because he didn't go to a big school, a lot of coaches and people get caught up in the Division III stuff and because he played at Division III, small school, a lot of people are just trying to write him off," Fletcher said. "As you look at it, he's definitely an excellent football player."

London Fletcher listens to edited rap, takes kids to the Capitol Building

Dan Steinberg
Washington Post
October 13, 2011

And now, for the most London Fletcher quote of all time. It comes from The Sporting News, which printed five Fletcher answers to fan-submitted questions, including one concerning his musical tastes.

"Well, I'll listen to R&B and mostly Christian music and stuff like that, but I'll listen to some Jay-Z and Kanye West. But only the edited versions. I don't like to get cussed out listening to my songs. I'm an older guy on the team, so for me to listen to Jay-Z and Kanye Wet, that kind of shocks some of the guys. And because it's the edited version, they'll get on me about that."

And if there was any question about what a team captain who listens to edited rap would be doing on his off day, Fletcher took kids from MacFarland Middle School to the Hill to hang out with Sen. Sherrod Brown and pose for photos in front of the Capitol Building and then go to the Adams Morgan Harris Teeter to shop for healthy foods. More photos at his Facebook page.

(More Sporting News answers from Fletcher at Hogs Haven, where he says that people at the Pro Bowl asked him why he was playing so hard. And in the print edition story, Fletcher says if he had to share a studio apartment with any current or former Redskin, he'd choose Sam Huff, because they both "want to destroy the opponent; we don't like anybody on the opposing team.")

Fletcher not keen on fading away

Zac Boyer
Free Lance Star
August 4, 2011

--London Fletcher has never missed a game in his 13 years playing in the NFL.

Why, then, would he give any thought to doing so now?

"You think about it, but really, you just take it one day at a time," Fletcher said. "It comes to everybody. Nobody plays forever."

Fletcher, 36, has been one of the league's premier linebackers since breaking in with St. Louis as an undrafted rookie out of John Carroll, a Division III university just outside Cleveland. He was one of just two rookies to make the Rams that year, and he played all 16 games, beginning a streak that has continued since.

There were brief rumors after the end of last season that Fletcher would consider retirement, whether it be before this season or after it, when his contract enters the fifth and final year and he's due to make approximately $5 million.

But Fletcher doesn't like to think about walking away from football, which made discussion regarding the topic yesterday morning at Redskins Park difficult. He's the kind of player who, ideally, would play forever--and surprisingly, his body has cooperated.

Fletcher's preparations are meticulous and well documented. He studies film, knows his opponent's strengths and weaknesses, and is dedicated to his conditioning. When the lockout began, it was Fletcher who rounded up nearly half the Redskins under contract for a "mini-camp" in May.

"You don't find guys like London very often," coach Mike Shanahan said. "But the guys who have passion for what they do--he's unbelievable with his preparation, [leaves] no stone unturned and has some strong perseverance, as well.

"You talk about the things that you look for in people as a veteran player, and he has everything. It's one of the reasons why he's been in the league that long and he's played so consistently."

The 5-foot-10, 245-pounder led the Redskins with 136 tackles last season, second in the NFC and sixth in the league, and had 2.5 sacks--the most he's had in one season since 2004, when he was in Buffalo.

It might have been his contributions off the field, however, that were more important. Fletcher has helped his teammates adjust to a 3-4 defensive scheme, though the Redskins allowed 389.2 yards per game last season to rank 31st out of 32 teams.

"He could really be our defensive coordinator if he really wanted to and call every play on the field as it happened," said linebacker Lorenzo Alexander, who considers Fletcher a good friend. "That's just how smart he is. But that comes with a lot of years of playing the game, understanding it, being smart and taking time to work on his craft."

Fletcher also has helped Ryan Kerrigan, the Redskins' first-round pick, adapt to the demands of being an outside linebacker.

Kerrigan, a defensive end at Purdue, projects to start next to Fletcher, and though a right knee injury has kept him out of all but the first few minutes of training camp, he has relied upon Fletcher to take him through the mental part of the game.

"He's an extension of the coaching staff on the field, and you hear that thrown around a lot, whether it's in college or pro football, but he really is," Kerrigan said. "It's really good to have a guy like him out there on the field."

Alexander, who is competing with Fletcher at inside linebacker but will likely remain his primary backup, often teases Fletcher about his experience.

"We always have a joke, because he has a son, and he says, 'I'm saving [the position] for my son,'" Alexander said. "But he still might be competing."

London Fletcher has been stabilizing force for Washington Redskins

Mike Jones
The Washington Post
August 2, 2011

In today's editions, Jason Reid writes about inside linebacker London Fletcher, whose effective leadership has provided stability during difficult times the past four seasons.

One of the NFL's smartest players, Fletcher is respected for, among many things, his commitment to preparation. He analyzes tape of opponents and the Redskins' defense daily, "hoping to see something I haven't seen before," he said. "Staying in that film room, and understanding the weaknesses and the strengths of our defense, it just helps you to be able to go out there and make plays."

Beginning his 14th season, Fletcher, 36, says he has not considered retirement, "though you obviously think about the next transition. I love the game, and I want to continue to stay involved, so you think about different ways you can stay in it."

With his smarts and work ethic, Fletcher would seem to be an ideal coaching candidate. It would probably please Daniel Snyder if Fletcher, the greatest free agent of Snyder's era as owner, joined the coaching staff after he retires.

It's a no-brainer, right?

"Well, I've actually thought about coaching very little," Fletcher said. "I have young kids – they're 4, 3 and 1 – so I don't want to be away from them. You've got to put in the hours when you're coaching."

"That's the only way to do it, especially when you're just starting out. So ... I just don't know about that. But I also know I have a lot to give back to the game. I don't want to keep it to myself."

Wide Receiver Jabar Gaffney

Ryan O'Halloran
CSNWashington.com

September 23, 2011

The two people least surprised quarterback Rex Grossman and receiver Jabar Gaffney have found chemistry during the Redskins' 2-0 start? Themselves. And it has nothing to do with playing together in college at Florida.

Through two games and playing 77.6 percent of the offensive snaps, Gaffney has eight catches for 116 yards and a touchdown.

"It's pretty easy to get a comfort level with somebody who is a savvy route runner and is smooth with his cuts and knows how to play the game," Grossman said this week.

Gaffney has caught passes from David Carr, Tom Brady, Matt Cassel, Kyle Orton and Tim Tebow during his years with Houston, New England and Denver so he is used to on-the-fly learning.

Once Grossman became eligible to practice in early August, he and Gaffney re-discovered the symmetry they had with the Gators.

"We got on the same page quickly – and I loved it," Gaffney said. "It's a tribute to the hard work we did in college and over time. We haven't missed a step."

Gaffney has quickly become the Redskins' No. 2 receiver behind Santana Moss, able to find an open spot in a defense at the right time – seven of his catches have gone for a first down or a touchdown.

"I take a lot of pride in that," Gaffney said. "Quarterbacks want guys who are in the right spot and that's one thing I've been able to do in my career – find the open spot in the zone and be a reliable target for them."

But that doesn't mean Gaffney still isn't a deep threat. Grossman missed him 37 yards downfield against the Giants and he later caught a pass 36 yards downfield (39-yard play). He also had a 20-yard reception against Arizona.

Said Grossman: "He just understands how to separate from defenders."

Kicker Graham Gano

DALY: Gano is getting his kicks with help from son's timely arrival

Dan Daly

August 21, 2011

As much as anything, kicking is about timing. So it was nice of Bryson Gano, Graham Gano's newborn son, to come into this world two days before the Washington Redskins' preseason game Friday at Indianapolis. Bryson's father, after all, is battling to keep his job, and a game-day delivery might have proved a distraction.

“The due date was the 24th,” Graham said before Sunday’s workout. “I was going to be in Baltimore then [to play the Ravens]. So we’ve been praying for a while that I’d be able to be there for the baby’s birth.” (The couple already had decided, though, that, under the circumstances, football had to come first - especially now that there’s another mouth to feed.)

Fortunately for the Ganos, Brittany went into labor during Wednesday’s practice. Graham jumped in his car, made it to the hospital in time to see his 5-pound, 12-ounce offspring draw his first breaths, then flew with his teammates to Indy, where he continued to make a strong case for himself by booting three field goals in a 16-3 win. He’s 6-for-6 in this preseason and looking like he might be the answer for the Redskins at what has been a problematic position.

He’s certainly been steadier than he was a year ago, when he had the lowest success rate of any qualifying NFL kicker (68.6 percent) and had key misses in several close losses. Good thing, too. Veteran Shayne Graham was brought in to challenge him early in camp - he was cut after missing two field goal tries in the preseason opener - and now Clint Stitser, who had a brief trial in Cincinnati last season, is competing with Gano.

After losing five games by a field goal or less last season, Mike Shanahan is determined to get his kicking game straightened out. But clearly, he’s not ready to give up on Gano. As he put it, “He did a great job kicking off, and he did make some good kicks” - including three in overtime to beat Green Bay, Tennessee and Jacksonville. “He wasn’t as consistent as you’d want, but that’s usually the case in your first year.”

Indeed, few kickers transition smoothly from the colleges to the pros. They usually bounce around for a couple of years, maybe longer, before finding steady employment. Mark Moseley, as famous a kicker as the franchise has had, spent some time with the Eagles and Houston Oilers before settling with the Redskins. People tend to forget that. Heck, before coming here, Gano was in camp with Baltimore, had tryouts with Atlanta and the New York Giants and even spent some time in the United Football League.

“I think it’s just a matter of consistency,” Gano said. “You’ve got to be consistent in all areas. In college, you might have some guys who are very good at kicking field goals, but their kickoffs are kind of shaky. So you have to have an all-around game, and that’s what I’ve worked on. I’ve made an adjustment in my technique, and I’ve done a lot of strength training and explosive training.”

Which brings us back to the subject of timing. Often, what determines the fate of a kicker - whether he makes your roster - is where he’s at in his career. After knocking around for a while, is he ready to take his game to the next level? Can he kick under pressure? Can he shake off a miss? Has he raised his accuracy to the 75- to 80 percent range? Until he can answer “yes” to all these questions, he’s going to have a hard time sticking with an NFL club.

Consider David Akers, one of the best kickers of the past decade. He was a Redskin, you may recall, for one game in 1998 (after tryouts with Atlanta and Carolina in ‘97). But he missed two long field goal attempts in that game, and the coaches decided he wasn’t ready for the big time (at which point they signed the more experienced Cary Blanchard).

The following year, after a stint in NFL Europe, Akers was picked up by Philadelphia - and booted for them, fabulously, for 11 seasons. Did the Redskins make a mistake? Not really. They were just unlucky. They caught Akers at the wrong time.

That's what's going on with Gano right now. Yes, he struggled last season, but he's also 24. So it behooves Shanahan to be patient with him a while longer - as long as he can stand, basically - lest he rue the day he let the kid get away.

"You can't keep waitin' and waitin' forever," special teams coach Danny Smith said. "Hopefully, it'll kick in [for Gano] this year. It just clicks at different times for different people, and hopefully it'll click for him this year with the pressure we're putting on him with other kickers."

So far, Gano has passed every test in this preseason. But two games remain, and there's no telling what kickers might show up on the waiver wire two weeks hence. Nothing, in other words, is guaranteed - and won't be until Graham is the last kicker standing.

"They told me before the season I was going to have competition," he said. "But everywhere I've been, every single year, I've had competition - college [Florida State], high school, everywhere I've gone. Competition only makes you better, so I welcome it. But in my mind, I believe I'm the [No. 1] guy. If I didn't, then I probably shouldn't be here."

The timing was wrong for Akers. Will it be right for Gano? If so, the Redskins have a chance to fix their kicking problems for the long term - perhaps even until Bryson Gano is playing Pop Warner.

Safety DeJon Gomes

Redskins rookie S DeJon Gomes ready if called upon

Mike Jones
The Washington Post – The Insider
September 10, 2011

The Washington Redskins will be thin at the safety position on Sunday with LaRon Landry still sidelined with a strained hamstring and Kareem Moore on the Physically Unable to Perform list.

Usual backup Reed Doughty will start at strong safety in place of Landry, and offseason addition Oshiomogho Atogwe plans on playing although he is listed as "questionable" with a hamstring injury on the team's injury report.

If one of those veterans goes down or needs a breather, rookie safety DeJon Gomes will be ready to take the field and help his team in whatever way possible.

Drafted in the fifth round out of Nebraska, Gomes is coming off of a strong preseason that saw him post a team-high 14 tackles and a sack. And so, the 5-foot-11, 200-pound Hayward, Calif., native and his coaches have confidence that he can get the job done if needs be.

“He’s looked pretty good. We feel good about him,” Redskins coach Mike Shanahan said. “He can play both the strong safety and the free safety position. He has a lot of speed and upside. He’s still a rookie, but I think he’s handling everything and he’s very sharp.”

Gomes, meanwhile, isn’t getting overly excited about his NFL debut. He’s eager to play, but he has managed to remain focused on preparing for his assignments rather than focus on the magnitude of possibly playing in the regular season opener.

“My mindset is the same as any other guys in my situation,” Gomes said. “In football, you’re one or two plays away from getting on the field, so you’ve got to prepare like you’re going to be starting and if something does happen, God forbid, then you go out there and do what you’ve done all week in practice. ... I know the system pretty well, but there are still things to iron out. [safeties] coach [Steve] Jackson and the other coaches have been teaching me a lot, so it’s been a good experience.”

Quarterback Rex Grossman

Zac Boyer
Free Lance Star
September 20, 2011

--When Washington Redskins quarterback Rex Grossman threw the second of his two interceptions against Arizona on Sunday, Grossman returned to the sideline and was met by a smiling Mike Shanahan.

The head coach knew Grossman, a veteran quarterback, would be able to overcome the mistake. His pass was intended for Anthony Armstrong but went off the receiver's fingers and was grabbed by Richard Marshall.

"At the end of the day, the response is where you put that ball, and Rex has been a quarterback long enough to understand to wipe those things out and find a way to win," Shanahan said yesterday. "That's what he was able to do."

Grossman finished the game 25-for-43 for 291 yards and two touchdowns in addition to the interceptions, leading the Redskins to a 22-21 victory over the Cardinals and their first 2-0 start to the season since 2007.

He was just 9 yards shy of becoming the first Washington quarterback to throw for over 300 yards in three consecutive games. More importantly, it was the fourth time Grossman has led a game-winning drive--and the first time he did so since leading the Chicago Bears over Shanahan and Denver in 2007.

"Those are the types of situations that I think build momentum and confidence as a team," Grossman said after the victory. "Knowing that throughout the course of the year, you are going to be put in a lot of adverse situations--I feel like we are 1-for-1 on that."

Shanahan did not want to elaborate yesterday when asked whether the two interceptions were Grossman's fault or if they were the result of mistakes made by his receivers. Earlier, Grossman was intercepted by Adrian Wilson while facing third and goal from the Cardinals' 8-yard line, attempting a pass to Santana Moss that was overthrown.

Moss said afterward he was the one who made the mistake, throwing in extra steps while running an out route on the pass that wrecked the continuity. On the second interception, the pass to Armstrong was tipped upward, though Marshall had a hand on Armstrong's jersey.

The quarterback was also sloppy in the opening quarter against the New York Giants before turning it around. Remarkably, Grossman completed 12 of 21 passes for 147 yards and one touchdown before halftime and was 13-for-22 for 144 yards and another touchdown afterward, though he was much improved in the second half.

Grossman's greatest completion was an 18-yard touchdown pass to Moss on fourth and 3 with 5:17 to play.

With Arizona in a cover-two defense, Grossman could have found Jabar Gaffney open in the left flat for the quick conversion, but instead found Moss open on a corner route in the right side of the end zone for the score.

"I knew that with that [defensive] formation, with that play, you have to choose who you want," Moss said.

"You don't know I'm running the corner, but the safety is going to have to have me. He had me, but he was so far away. The corner [route] was just the perfect play at the right time."

Choosing to go for the conversion, instead of attempting a 35-yard field goal by Graham Gano, was an easy decision for Shanahan to make. Down eight points, the Redskins needed the touchdown and the two-point conversion.

"I'm not usually conservative," Shanahan said. "I usually take chances. That's usually my mindset.

Sometimes, it all depends on the tempo of the game or the type of team you're facing. How good's the defense? How's your running game going? A lot of ingredients go into something like that."

Through the first two weeks, Grossman has completed 59.7 percent of his passes to rank 21st among starting quarterbacks. But he has completed 70.8 percent of his attempts in the fourth quarter, which ranks fourth among quarterbacks with at least seven attempts, and has two touchdowns to show for it.

And two victories.

"I think it shows that this team believes in itself and believes that we are going to make the big plays at the end of the game to win," Grossman said Sunday. "You can just feel it. You are going to have adversity throughout the year, and in the NFL it's what it's about and how you handle it. I think we handled it well today."

Rex Grossman gets another chance with Washington Redskins after being 'lightning rod' in Chicago

Barry Svrluga
September 10, 2011

The last time an NFL season opened and Rex Grossman took the field as a starting quarterback was four years ago. He was 27, coming off a 13-3 season and a Super Bowl appearance. Were he any other quarterback in any other city, billboards might have carried his likeness; jerseys would have flown off the shelves.

Chicago could have been Grossman's town. It was not.

"A lot of people look back on the Rex Grossman era," said former Bears wide receiver Tom Waddle, now a sports-talk radio host in Chicago, "and they feel a little bit unfulfilled."

Take another sports-talk radio host, and take that a step further.

"I think the fans here, they remember him as a punch line," said Mike Mulligan, a Chicago native.

So when Washington Redskins Coach Mike Shanahan uttered the following words on Monday — "The starting quarterback will, obviously, be Rex" — nowhere did it resonate more than in Chicago. Not in Bloomington, Ind., where Grossman set records as a stud high school player who was recruited nationally. Not in Gainesville, Fla., where he quarterbacked Steve Spurrier's Florida Gators and became the Heisman Trophy runner-up.

In Washington, Shanahan's pronouncement that Grossman had beaten out John Beck to start Sunday's season opener against the New York Giants was met with some measure of debate and curiosity, but not much passion. In Chicago?

"People are totally snickering. That's the word," Mulligan said. "Is it unfair to him? Sure. But it is absolutely what's happening. There's no respect given to him in Chicago. People are like, 'Rex is starting in Washington? Ha.' "

No one in the 91-year history of the Bears has thrown more postseason passes than Grossman, who was a first-round draft pick by Chicago. Since the franchise won its only Super Bowl championship, following the 1985 season, 34 quarterbacks have attempted regular season passes for the Bears. Only one has done so in another Super Bowl: Rex Grossman.

"Not everybody makes it to a Super Bowl," Grossman said last week, his only public hint of bravado. "But I do not want to talk about Chicago any more."

Grossman's experience in Chicago, where he was once a first-round draft pick and the hope for the future, will help shape his experience in Washington. Since he left there after the 2008 season — after 31 starts, 33 touchdown passes and 36 interceptions — he served as a backup in Houston for one season and a backup with the Redskins for another until he took over for Donovan McNabb to mop up a disappointing 2010. The road to winning a starting job, then losing it painfully, then winning it again will inform what happens next.

"I think you're hardened any time you play the position of quarterback in the National Football League," said Shanahan, himself a Chicago native. "I think you get hardened very quickly. There's a lot of responsibility, a lot of pressure, especially in Chicago. . . . There's always a lot of pressure, because they do have tradition."

Losing city's support

Grossman's career in Chicago ended, in effect, on Sept. 23, 2007. That night, the Bears hosted Dallas, their third game of the season. The expectations in Chicago were a second consecutive Super Bowl appearance, this time with a win. Excuses need not apply.

To that point, Grossman had thrown one touchdown and three interceptions, and the Bears were 1-1 — which, to fans, meant not good enough. His status as the team's starter had been something of a week-to-week referendum even in 2006, even as he started all 16 games, even as the Bears won the NFC championship. The situation was so combustible that Bears Coach Lovie Smith's weekly status update — "Rex is our quarterback" — disappointed so many fans it eventually appeared on T-shirts.

"That's a lot of pressure on a young kid," former Bears wide receiver Muhsin Muhammad said. "I would say that some of that pressure probably got to Rex. I can't say 100 percent, but if you compare how he played in the first six, seven games of 2006 to 2007, there's just an obvious change."

In September 2006, Grossman was named the NFC's offensive player of the month, and the Bears rolled to a 7-0 start. The stops and starts that had marked his career — a torn anterior cruciate ligament in 2004, a broken ankle in 2005 — were behind him. A city that knows everything about ferocity at middle linebacker and little about stability at quarterback suddenly seemed like it had its man.

But in the sixth week of that season — in a game that's actually still remembered because Dennis Green, then the coach of the Arizona Cardinals, bellowed at members of the media afterward, "The Bears are who we thought they were!" — Chicago won 24-23 on the strength of two fourth-quarter returns, one of a fumble, one of a punt. Grossman, though, threw four interceptions and lost two fumbles. In Chicago, fans rapidly became familiar with two personalities, distinctly different: "Good Rex" and "Bad Rex."

"I knew he could get hot," said Redskins offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan, who was with Houston when the Texans brought Grossman in for 2009. "I also knew he could get cold. I think that was a time where he kept both teams in the game."

On Sept. 23, 2007, Grossman did not keep the Bears in the game. Against Dallas, in prime time in front of a national audience, he completed 15 of 32 passes for 195 yards. He threw three interceptions. He was sacked three times. The Bears lost, 34-10. After that game, Smith did not say what he had said so often: Rex is our quarterback.

"Chicago, it's a tough town for quarterbacks," said Pep Hamilton, who took over as the Bears' quarterbacks coach in 2007. "In a lot of instances, I honestly think it was unfair to put all of the responsibility of the team's shortcomings on Rex Grossman. But that's what happened."

Said Muhammad: "Patience, in that town, is not a virtue."

Three days later, before Smith announced his decision, the Chicago Sun-Times published an editorial that ran under the headline: "Benching heart-stopping QB important for city's health" and read, in part, "we were on the verge of calling our alderman to see if there was some kind of ‘detrimental to Chicago’ clause that could get Rex benched.”

“I was kind of the lightning rod,” Grossman said last week. “What’s going to happen?”

Later that day, Smith replaced Grossman with journeyman Brian Griese. Grossman reappeared later in the season, but the Bears finished 7-9. The next season, Kyle Orton was Chicago’s starter. The next year, Grossman was gone.

“You never got the sense that he thought he was treated unfairly,” said Waddle, who hosted a Sunday night television show during the season on which Grossman made a weekly appearance. “You could have never asked a guy to be more professional. He had a very up-and-down career here, but you always had a constant of him off the field. He was very professional, and he never complained.”

Second chances

On Wednesday morning, in the Redskins’ locker room at the team’s Ashburn training facility, Grossman stopped before he walked past rookie running back Roy Helu, who sat on the floor, stretching. Grossman had a question about the route Helu liked to take before he received a handoff on a specific play. The two worked out the kink, and the starting quarterback of the Redskins walked back to his locker, shuffling in his flip-flops.

“That’s Rex,” veteran wide receiver Jabar Gaffney said. “That’s how he is. He doesn’t really give a care about how anybody thinks.”

A decade ago, Gaffney and Grossman were teammates at Florida during a tumultuous time when, as Gaffney said, Spurrier’s philosophy was, “Get the job done, or it’ll be musical quarterbacks.”

So when Gaffney arrived in a trade from Denver prior to the season, he took one look at his old buddy, and thought the Redskins’ quarterback race just might be over.

“As soon you saw him, you could tell he had that confidence,” Gaffney said. “You could tell it was gonna be his job.”

Grossman’s last start for the Bears came in November 2008, and it was only because Orton was hurt. His starts for the Redskins last year came mostly because McNabb struggled so mightily in Shanahan’s offense that the coach wanted to see someone else — anyone else — grab the reins.

Now, Grossman has been in the same offensive system for three straight years. (It is, notably, not the straightforward scheme run by the Bears, which one Redskins’ official referred to as “Neanderthal.”) He beat out Beck, whose ability Mike Shanahan has raved about, because he was better in three preseason appearances.

Four years have passed. Chicago is gone. And whether Bears fans believe it or not, Rex Grossman is a starting quarterback in the NFL once again.

“I feel like I’m a better quarterback than I was then, and I like my chances going into this season a lot better than I did then,” Grossman said. “I’m a much more grounded quarterback and confident in my abilities. . . .

“I didn’t take it for granted in Chicago. But any time something gets taken away from you and you get it back, you have a different outlook, a different type of approach and respect to the position you’re in.”

Cornerback DeAngelo Hall

Virginia governor Bob McDonnell joined Washington Redskins cornerback DeAngelo Hall and linebacker Ryan Kerrigan at Albert Hill Middle School in Richmond on Tuesday to lead a group of 50 students and speak to others as part of the NFL’s “Play 60” initiative.

“We know that the healthier our students are, especially during the demanding years of middle school, the more they are going to be able to focus and achieve academically,” McDonnell said in a statement released by the team. “We encourage parents, teachers, neighbors, and friends to join with us to help our students meet the Redskins Play 60 Challenge.”

“It is so important for kids to get up and get active,” Hall said in the statement. “The Play 60 challenge provides a way to do this and gives them a chance to earn Redskins incentives along the way.”

The event, co-sponsored by the Washington Redskins Charitable Foundation and GlaxoSmithKline, was held to encourage kids to make fitness an everyday activity. The NFL’s “Play 60” campaign tries to get kids to lead an active lifestyle to prevent obesity and other health conditions, including heart disease and diabetes.

DeAngelo Hall says no star power is no problem for Redskins

Mike Jones
The Washington Post – The Insider
August 30, 2011

The Washington Redskins in the last decade have posted a winning record just twice. But there has been no shortage of star power and flashy, big-name free agent signings or trades – until this year.

With Donovan McNabb now in Minnesota, Albert Haynesworth in New England and Clinton Portis still without a team, Coach Mike Shanahan purged the team of the big names and stars.

The most recognizable players still on the roster are DeAngelo Hall, Chris Cooley, London Fletcher and Brian Orakpo. But none of them are considered to rank among the league’s biggest names.

Washington passed on the chance to sign high-profile players in free agency and instead pursued role players willing to sacrifice for the greater good. Shanahan repeatedly has stressed that this year, the Redskins' roster comprises hungry, high-character players.

Hall last season recorded six interceptions and earned Pro Bowl MVP honors, but said the Redskins are better off this year despite a lack of big stars. The seventh-year veteran declared that although Washington may not have Pro Bowl players at every position, the roster features solid players at nearly every position.

"Just because people in the media aren't making them out to be Tom Brady or Peyton Manning or anyone like that doesn't mean that we don't have players," Hall said. "If you go down our roster and you ask opposing teams about guys in this locker room, they'll definitely say, 'You've got to watch out for this guy, and you've got to watch out for this guy. That guy's a [bull] dog.' Each individual person brings something different to the table. Do we have a guy that we're paying $100 million to? No we don't. But who needs a guy that you're going to pay $100 million to if he won't come out onto the field and play?"

Fletcher is team's vocal leader and captain of the defense. But the Redskins still don't even know who their quarterback will be.

Hall said this year's group doesn't concern itself with who's team the Redskins are, so to speak.

"It's the team. The best part about this team is that it's a team," said Hall, who doesn't hesitate speaking up when needed. "The Dallas Mavericks might've had Dirk Nowitzki but they played as a team. Different guys stepped up at different times. It wasn't about one or two guys that were made to lead the franchise to a championship. It was about the whole team working together as a team to get that done."

Wide Receiver Leonard Hankerson

The Washington Times
Anthony Chiang
November 13, 2011

MIAMI GARDENS, Fla. — Despite the loss, Leonard Hankerson will always remember Sunday's game.

The rookie didn't just post a career high in receptions and receiving yards against the Miami Dolphins, but he also returned home for the first time since being selected by the Washington Redskins in the third round of the 2011 NFL Draft.

"It was very special to go out there and play in front of my family in the stadium that I've been playing in for the last three years," Hankerson said. "It was special to have my family come out there and see me."

The Fort Lauderdale native, who spent four years at the University of Miami, had about 50 of his closest friends and family members scattered around Sun Life Stadium during Sunday's 20-9 loss to the Dolphins.

Hankerson treated them to quite the performance.

In his second career start, he led the Redskins with eight catches for 106 yards before leaving because of a right hip strain late in the fourth quarter. After the game, he said his hip was “a little sore,” and he didn’t know if it would force him to miss any time.

However, he was on the field just long enough to become the first Redskins rookie wide receiver to accumulate more than 100 receiving yards in a game since Rod Gardner did it on Oct. 21, 2001.

“It just felt good to contribute to the team and know that I’m capable of making plays,” Hankerson said.

Two of the most impressive aspects of Hankerson’s performance are that his eight catches came on just nine chances, and he accounted for nearly 50 percent of Washington’s passing offense.

These types of stats wouldn’t have been possible for him earlier in the season, as he struggled to find playing time. But after impressing teammates and coaches in practice over the past couple of weeks, Hankerson has found a spot in Washington’s offense.

After not seeing the field in the Redskins’ first five games of the year, the 6-foot-2 wide receiver has caught at least one pass in the past three contests and made his first career start last Sunday against San Francisco.

“[My comfort level in the offense is] growing a whole lot,” he said, “because, being on scout team and then going to get reps with the first-team offense, it’s helping me get more confidence to go out there and do what I have to do.”

Redskins’ Leonard Hankerson has time on his hands

Rich Campbell

October 13, 2011

Leonard Hankerson shuffled through the hallway outside the locker room at Redskins Park on Thursday morning with a backpack slung over his left shoulder. His presence was required in a meeting upstairs in six minutes, barely enough time to chat.

The meeting was another element of preparation for the Washington Redskins’ game Sunday against the Philadelphia Eagles. It’s a huge NFC East matchup, one in which Hankerson knows there’s a strong chance he won’t play. The rookie receiver wasn’t activated for any of the Redskins’ first four games, and nothing appears to have merited a change to the depth chart.

This wasn't what Hankerson envisioned when the Redskins drafted him in the third round in April. For now, "Hank Time" involves running the scout team offense on Thursday instead of making plays on Sunday. But he is maintaining a positive attitude and determined to capitalize on his chance to play, whenever that arises.

"Any competitor, anybody that wants to play and knows he can help the team out, it's going to be tough for them," Hankerson said. "I can't control it. The only thing I can control is going out to practice and doing what I got to do, keep working hard and getting better."

Redskins coach Mike Shanahan touted the decision to draft Hankerson 79th overall as an easy one. His 13 touchdowns for the University of Miami last season were a school record. The Redskins, meanwhile, needed a receiver to spark their middling offense.

Hankerson, however, dropped passes too frequently in training camp and in preseason games. That landed him at the bottom of a seven-receiver depth chart.

"Any player is going to come in and be anxious wanting to make a play to get playing time," he said. "But now I look back on it, and I didn't really have to do that. I could have just been doing what I'm doing now, just coming in here, catching the ball, looking it all the way in and getting better."

Now he's stuck waiting for his chance. He knows it likely will take injuries to other players, but it's difficult to be patient.

Hankerson has turned to coaching assistant Richmond Flowers for support. Flowers, a former receiver who spent a short time on the Redskins' active roster in 2002, understands Hankerson's mental struggle. He fought to be noticed in several teams' training camps and on various practice squads during his brief NFL career.

"Hank's got a challenge," Flowers said. "I want to let him know that the most important thing is to not let any of it weigh you down and just come out and fight every day. Don't worry about anything else besides coming to practice, working on your technique and catching every ball you can."

Hankerson's attitude is paramount, Flowers said. Either he could pout about being left out of the rotation, or he could productively use this time to prepare himself for an eventual opportunity to play.

"At times you start to feel like you're not a part of it, and I can see that with him, but I tell him just to keep working," said Terrence Austin, a former seventh-round receiver who experienced a similar struggle as a rookie last year. "The coach sees everything that he's doing, and really it's about being patient. His time will come. It's not like he can't play. He can definitely play."

Hankerson must prove that by being consistent. That was his downfall in the preseason. On some plays, he would appear every bit the playmaker the Redskins believe the 6-foot-3, 205-pounder can be. Then he'd drop a pass over the middle because he turned to run before securing the ball.

"I think that's what Hank is working to do - being consistent in practice, the meeting room, the way he approaches his studies, his workouts, consistently catching balls after practice," Flower said. "Good players ... consistently do the same things every day."

Outside the locker room, Hankerson concluded his chat with a reporter and bolted up the steps, another chance to hurry up and wait.

"I just keep doing what I'm doing in practice, just keep getting better," he said, "and my time will come."

Miami Hurricanes' Leonard Hankerson proves he has staying power

Susan Miller Degan

Miami Herald Staff Writer

November 9, 2010

The man on the other end of that season-saving touchdown Saturday has been so dependable this year that, like the clock on your favorite appliance, he's almost an afterthought.

When Miami receiver Leonard Hankerson announced the day after Christmas that he was ``80 percent" sure of his decision regarding leaving early for the NFL Draft, but that he would wait to reveal it until after the bowl game, most people figured he was gone.

After all, ``Hank" has a son who turned 4 in February and a daughter who turned 2 last month, and he sure could have used the money.

He was asked then why he might stay.

``We know we're going to be a contender next year and we're going to work hard," he said at the time. ``I love everybody around here. . . . I just love the school."

Why leave?

``Just going out and feeling I can play at the next level for my kids, for my family."

Nine games into the 2010 season, as the Hurricanes (6-3, 4-2 Atlantic Coast Conference) prepare to play Saturday at Georgia Tech (5-4, 3-3), it's evident he made the right decision.

Hankerson leads the ACC in receiving yards per game, with 83, and is on pace to be the first UM player to break 1,000 yards since Andre Johnson -- No. 2 all-time in single-season receiving yards -- had 1,092 yards in 2002.

Not only will the Fort Lauderdale St. Thomas Aquinas High alum receive his liberal arts degree in May, but he also is thriving in football. Hankerson has caught a pass in 22 consecutive games and leads UM in catches (48), yards (747) and receiving touchdowns (10).

Should he topple the 1,000-yard barrier, among the names he would surpass on the all-time list: Willie Smith (852), Michael Irvin (868), Santana Moss (899) and Wesley Carroll (952).

Eddie Brown had the top receiving season in UM history with 1,114 yards in 1984.

“It's tremendous for him and for us,” UM coach Randy Shannon said of Hankerson's decision to return. “He's a better football player than he was last year. And the better he is, the better we are.”

Hankerson said by phone Monday that the NFL College Advisory Committee projected last winter that he would have been selected “anywhere between the fourth and seventh round” had he left early for the draft.

“I knew I was better than that,” he said.

As a freshman, he caught six passes for 63 yards and a touchdown. As a sophomore, he had 11 for 140 yards and two touchdowns. Last season, after working all summer with former Dolphins receiver Mark Duper, he surged to 45 catches for 801 yards and six scores.

Plagued with drops early in his career, Hankerson still has his moments. But they are getting fewer.

“This season, I've gotten better blocking for the run game, being more physical and looking the ball in,” he said. “It's harder than you think when you're trying to make a play for your team. Before I was like, ‘Let's make a big play.’ Now I'm, ‘Just catch the ball and whatever happens, happens.’” NFLDraftScout.com rates the 6-2, 207-pound Hankerson as the top wide receiver in the draft and projects him as the next-to-last first-round pick.

“When I was a sophomore, I put all my UM goals on the wall,” Hankerson said. “Now I have a little notebook in my phone of what I want to get done -- for the team and personally. I think I can reach 1,000 yards.”

LaRon Byrd, who caught two passes from freshman Stephen Morris during the winning drive against Maryland that Hankerson culminated with a 35-yard touchdown catch, said UM's receivers are grateful that Hankerson returned.

“He has come to the realization that he can do anything he wants,” Byrd said. “That catch was the one we needed when we needed it. I knew when he came out of that route he had the cornerback beat. Stephen got hit on the play, but the ball went up and had a nice, tight spiral.

“Hank did the rest.”

Leonard III, whom Hankerson calls LJ, approved. He goes to home games with Kienarria and their mom, Marketria Smith.

“He wears my jersey and throws up the U,” Hankerson said, laughing.

Dad said he hasn't thought much about his future, other than his children will be “a lot better off” that he stayed for his senior year.

As for Georgia Tech's 21st-ranked pass defense, he's preparing for that like he does for every opponent: with plenty of hard work and focus.

“Whatever it takes,” Hankerson said. “We’ll get it done.”

Tim Reynolds

Associated Press

September 6, 2010

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Miami wide receiver Leonard Hankerson is already experiencing things his own father never could.

It's a Saturday morning in South Florida. Hankerson is at a park, watching a bunch of 4-year-olds shuffling around a football field in helmets and shoulder pads for the first time.

He's watching the boy everyone around the Hurricanes calls "Lil' Hank." His son.

"So much fun for me," Hankerson said. "Every day, when I see him, he wants to play football."

Hankerson, a senior for the 13th-ranked Hurricanes, cherishes these rare moments of free time, because he simply doesn't have many of them. He's a full-time student. He's a full-time football player. And then there's his real full-time commitment — being a father of two children, son Leonard III and daughter Kienarria, who turns 2 in October.

"We have a lot of help," said Marketria Smith, Hankerson's longtime girlfriend and the children's mother. "We've learned how to make it work. But it's hard."

Still, it's not the hardest thing Hankerson has ever dealt with. Not even close.

He cherishes fatherhood for many reasons, including one he rarely speaks about.

Leonard Hankerson Sr. was killed Jan. 3, 1989, with authorities saying at the time he was shot to death by someone who wanted to sell crack cocaine on his street. His son was born 27 days later.

Leonard Hankerson II hears the stories to this day, about what kind of man his father was, how he was one of talent-rich Broward County's best basketball players at one time.

But he never knew the man whose name he bears.

"Leonard has been through a lot," Miami coach Randy Shannon said. "He's had his ups and downs. From that comes his maturity."

With two kids, discretionary income is a rarity for Hankerson and Smith. With the unyielding demands of school and football, Hankerson doesn't exactly have time for high-paying work. Smith works as a troubleshooter for Sprint mobile. It's often a struggle.

"I barely hang out off the field," Hankerson said one day after practice. "I just do what I've got to do here, take care of business, then go home and take care of business. If you want to do the right things, it's not that hard. You come here, do your work, go to class, go home, take care of your kids, play with your kids, be there for your kids. It's not hard at all."

Many thought Hankerson would leave Miami for a pro paycheck after making 45 catches for team-bests of 801 yards and six touchdowns last season as a junior. At 6-foot-3, 215 pounds and with good hands and speed, Hankerson seems to have just about everything the NFL would be looking for.

Turns out, Hankerson never really gave it much thought. He was staying in school.

"It wasn't that hard a decision because we've got something great going on around here," Hankerson said. "I know we've got a chance to be on top this year. So I came back, because I wanted to be around when that happens."

He's one of the reasons why the 13th-ranked Hurricanes — who travel to No. 2 Ohio State on Saturday — think that way.

Hankerson is one of nine players with at least six catches for 115 yards and two touchdowns so far on the long opening weekend of major college football.

After the way he played in Week 1, Hankerson's stock might be soaring by the time next year's NFL draft rolls around.

"He has that senior leadership and he's taken control over the wide receiver corps," said Miami quarterback Jacory Harris, who often says Hankerson is one of his favorite go-to targets. "He helps everybody get on the same page with me and the rest of the offense. That is the sign of a mature receiver. Can't ask for much more."

A few days after fall-semester classes began at Miami, Hankerson was tossing a football around with his son and daughter on the practice fields behind the Hurricanes' football complex.

Leonard III was trying to impress his father, telling him often what a good receiver he is. Kienarria was heaving the ball so hard, swinging it across her little body, that even her dad had a tough time keeping it in his hands. And when their quick game of catch was over, father and mother, brother and sister walked across campus, a quiet family moment.

"He finds time to make it all work," Smith said. "I'm lucky. Most guys, well, a girl couldn't wish to have someone like Leonard."

Running Back Roy Helu

Redskins' Roy Helu is a different sort of running back

The Washington Post

October 13, 2011

Rookie Roy Helu is the least known of the three running backs who split time in the Washington Redskins' backfield. There's apparently a reason for that.

"He's very different," said New York Giants cornerback Prince Amukamara, one of Helu's closest friends and a former college teammate at Nebraska.

Helu has flash, but he's not flashy.

"I don't know how to describe it. You have to be around Roy to experience him," said Redskins safety DeJon Gomes, another college teammate. "He might seem dingy, but that's not it at all."

Helu is set in his ways, but he's hard to pin down.

"He has a unique spirit about him," said Matt Penland, the Nebraska team chaplain.

As coaches decide whether to start Ryan Torain or Tim Hightower at running back in Sunday's game against the Philadelphia Eagles, Helu has been the backfield constant through four games. He's a change-of-pace back who is averaging 5.3 yards per carry. He's elusive and quick, and though he's just 22 years old, coaches say they're impressed with his focus.

"He's a guy who lives without cable and television and Internet," Amukamara said. "He doesn't need that. He's such a simple guy. He doesn't really need much. He's not someone who'd ever need to spend a lot of money on anything."

In fact, earlier this month Helu texted Redskins wide receiver Niles Paul, another Nebraska teammate. Helu was shopping for his first pair of Nike sneakers but was shocked to learn they would cost more than $100. "Get them, Roy! Get them!" Paul told him. But Helu didn't. "That's just Roy," Paul said.

"You only can describe him as Roy Helu," Paul continued. "He is Roy. He is his own person. He's not embarrassed; he's not ashamed of anything he does. He takes it all with a smile and goes about his business."

A father's influence

Helu credits his father for his football ability, though Roy Sr. didn't even know about football until he moved to the United States from Tonga in 1974. Roy Sr. grew up playing rugby, eventually earning his way onto the U.S. national team.

Living in California's Bay Area, the Helus had six children. After three girls, Helu was the first boy. He started in soccer at a young age but began playing football when he was 8. His father's skill set translated nicely to the football backfield.

"You have to have speed, vision, cutting ability and quickness," Roy Sr. said of rugby. "It's just like football."

With his father helping teach him footwork and running, Helu eventually earned a scholarship to Nebraska. The Tongans are a tight-knit, family-oriented people, and Helu had to adjust to life away from home.

The football team was struggling as well, and Helu says he lacked a sense of direction. He called the team chaplain, who arranged to have breakfast. "The day I gave my life to the Lord, everything changed," Helu said. "It gave me more purpose. Not more purpose, but purpose."

His career took off, too. Helu totaled 803 yards as a sophomore and 1,147 as a junior. Roy Sr. still followed his son's games closely. Watching Nebraska play Texas on television, he saw his son miss holes right in front of him. He flew out to Nebraska and sat down to study film with Helu. Roy Sr. was no football expert, but he knew running.

"Running is running," Helu said. "Period." "After the game, he knew he was going to be a hot commodity for the media," Amukamara said. "They'd want to ask him and talk about it. He said, 'Watch, I'm just going to talk about Jesus. Let them hear about Him.' "

Former teammates say Helu shied away from any celebrity attached to his athletic prowess. He prays in practice and says his play on the field is an "opportunity to glorify God." Football is merely a platform.

"We'd go into these retirement homes on team visits," said Penland, the Nebraska chaplain. "A lot of the kids stand around and don't know what to do, Roy just walks over, sticks his hand out and starts asking questions. He has so much charisma. And he's not trying to promote himself, he's genuinely interested in other people."

'You have to work hard'

Helu left Nebraska fourth on the school's all-time rushing list. At the NFL Combine, he posted top-10 marks in six of his seven drills, including the best times among running backs in both the 20-yard dash and the 60-yard shuttle drill.

“He called me before the draft,” Roy Sr. said, “and he asked me, ‘Dad you never told me I can make it to the NFL. Why?’ I said, ‘No, I never told you that. I didn’t want you to think it’s easy to get there. You have to work hard.’ ”

During the NFL draft, when Helu’s name hadn’t been called through the first three rounds, the Redskins jumped, trading their way to the 105th pick. The Redskins saw a raw talent, a player with great one-cut ability. The same skills that made Roy Sr. one of the nation’s top rugby players had been passed on to his son.

“Once you have to teach a running back how to run, you have the wrong running back,” Redskins Coach Mike Shanahan said. “When you get a guy like Helu, you don’t know why guys make plays, but the great ones do. I think Helu is giving people the idea that he does have some skills. . . . Hopefully, he just continues to grow.”

With both Hightower and Torain more likely to serve as a lead back, Helu knows his rookie season is one designated for growth. In the Redskins’ second game, against Arizona, Helu strung together 112 all-purpose yards, including 74 on the ground. After the game, he discussed his faith, then praised his offensive line before finally discussing his own play.

In the next game at Dallas, though, he had only 15 yards on five carries. Roy Sr. flew to Northern Virginia the following week, and once again, father and son spent several days watching tape, talking about footwork and identifying holes.

“I never interfere with any coach. I just talk to him,” Roy Sr. said. “The idea is to get better. And that takes a lot of work. This is what I’ve been telling him since he first started.”

They studied the film and spent several days talking about the upcoming game. The next Saturday, Helu ran for 307 yards and three touchdowns against Missouri. Nebraska is known for its history of talented running backs, but no one before Helu — not Roger Craig, Calvin Jones, Mike Rozier, Lawrence Phillips, Ahman Green nor anyone else — had posted so many yards in a single game.

Running Back Tim Hightower

Tim Hightower focusing on a full recovery, charity work

Mike Jones
The Washington Post
November 1, 2011

Washington Redskins running back Tim Hightower, keeping busy despite being hobbled by a torn ACL, took part Tuesday in an NFL Play 60 event. The fourth-year pro said he isn't worried about the long recovery ahead of him or his future with the team.

Hightower and his mother Nikkie visited Steuart W. Weller Elementary School in Ashburn and presented students and faculty with a $10,000 NFL Play 60 grant for health and wellness programming and equipment. Hightower's mother also presented the Procter & Gamble P&G Super Parents award – a $1,000 check for the support of the school's athletic department. Steuart W. Weller Elementary was one of 34 schools across the country selected as winners in the Play 60 Back to Football Friday contest.

Hightower was scheduled to lead students through a series of fitness activities, but because he is on crutches, he enlisted the help of fellow backs Darrel Young, Roy Helu and Ryan Torain.

Hightower, who tore his ACL on Oct. 23 in a loss to Carolina, said he still felt it was important for him to attend the event and encourage the students to live healthy lives, even though he could only watch.

"A huge part of my rehab being a success is doing stuff like this to keep my spirits up. I know everything will work for the good," Hightower said by phone. "So what, I'm hurt. You never know what a kid's going through, so I wanted to still do whatever I can to encourage them."

"Coming home to the Northern Virginia area to play football was extremely important to me, not just because of football, but because of the opportunity to invest in the communities close to my home," added Hightower, who grew up in Alexandria.

Hightower, who was placed on injured reserve last Tuesday, has yet to have surgery but continues to receive treatment as the swelling in his left knee goes down. Hightower, whom Washington acquired from Arizona on July 31, was playing on a one-year restricted free agent contract and will be a free agent next spring.

He wants to return to the Redskins, but for now, Hightower says his primary focus is making a full recovery and using his extra time to involve himself in charitable work.

"It's all going to work out," said Hightower, who in five games had recorded a team-high 84 carries for 321 yards and a touchdown while also posting 10 catches for 78 yards and a touchdown. "...I came here for a specific purpose, to play football here and to make a lasting impression on peoples lives. That's what I'm doing now. As far as football. I'll be fine. I'm taking everything one day at a time and I know it'll all work out."

Redskins running back Tim Hightower: A very purpose-driven life

Barry Svrluga
The Washington Post
September 17, 2011

Tim Hightower wears a black rubber bracelet on his right wrist that bears the words "Purpose Driven." On his back, he wears a shoulder-to-shoulder tattoo — the same saying, bracketed by wings. In front of him sits his next, best chance to become what he has told folks he would become since he was a fifth-grader in Fort Washington: a star in the NFL, right here with his hometown Washington Redskins. You have evidence to the contrary? Don't dare approach him with it.

"When you understand your purpose, that purpose will drive you," Hightower said last week. "That focus, that goal, it drove me to the point where that's all I could think about. That was it. That was my purpose, to get to the NFL."

The condensed version of Hightower's story is this: His singular dream appeared thwarted when he suffered an injury during his senior year of high school. He took the only college scholarship offered him, even though it wasn't from a Division I school. He played a position for which he didn't believe he was suited. He eventually broke out in his final collegiate season, but still wasn't so much as invited to the NFL's scouting combine.

Yet Sunday, his family will gather at FedEx Field, the same stadium they used to avoid because of the traffic on game days, and watch Hightower against yet another perceived doubter — the Arizona Cardinals, his former team. "The road less traveled," Hightower calls his route, and that's fair.

Hightower had no backup plan should the NFL not work out. That could be perceived as impractical. Hightower speaks of it with a measure of pride. He would allow no other discussion. He would play in the NFL. He would play in the NFL. To heck with the naysayers.

"It got to the point where if you told me that I wasn't going to do it," Hightower said, "you almost instantly became the enemy."

There were, it seemed, as many enemies as there were reasons to believe Hightower wouldn't reach the pros. He wasn't particularly fast. He wasn't very flexible. The yards he racked up at Richmond came against Towson and Northeastern, not Tennessee and Nebraska.

"We would pray with him and believe in him," said Mike Freeman, Hightower's pastor as both a child and an adult. "But with all the adversities and the uncommon route and track he's had, it was almost, at times, difficult for us to keep up with his belief."

His belief in himself, in his ability to attain his dream, colored every one of his interactions. Hightower remembers sitting in a dorm room with a girl his sophomore year.

"I don't mean any disrespect," she said, "but you're at Richmond. Have you ever thought about that? What if it doesn't happen?"

The question almost didn't register.

"But what if it does?" Hightower responded.

"What if it doesn't?" she shot back.

They volleyed perhaps 20 times, Hightower recalled. Neither budged.

“What if it does?” Hightower said. “What if it does?”

“The more she asked, ‘What if it doesn’t?’,” Hightower said, “the angrier I got.”

‘Big man on campus’

If Hightower’s path to the Redskins was un-or-tho-dox — Arizona selected him in the fifth round of the 2008 draft, and he spent three seasons there before arriving in a July 31 trade for defensive lineman Vonnie Holliday and a sixth-round draft pick — his high school career was downright strange. He began as a freshman at Friendly in Oxon Hill. As a sophomore, he started at DeMatha, the Hyattsville football power. After a month, he went back to Friendly. A month later, he was off to Westlake in Waldorf.

The reasons, Hightower said, were complex. His mother, Nikkie, worked as a teacher and school administrator, and she wasn’t particularly impressed with the Prince George’s County schools. When he enrolled at DeMatha, he found the athletic competition he wanted.

“But at that point at DeMatha, we had a program in place,” said Redskins cornerback Byron Westbrook, who used to pick up Hightower so they could schlep off to Hyattsville together. “He was good, but you didn’t just come in and play. The seniors played. You had to wait your turn.”

Hightower has never been much for waiting his turn. There were financial concerns as well, he said. As a junior, he finally settled at Episcopal High School, a boarding school in Alexandria. He was following his sister Victoria, the youngest of the Hightowers’ four children.

The adjustments were significant. He couldn’t go home. The academics were challenging. He knew no one. But in football, he found himself.

“It was cool because — and this is the selfish part of me — I got to be the center of attention,” Hightower said. “They treated me like I was the big man on campus.”

In the summer before his senior year, Hightower trained three times a day, going from the basketball court to the track to the football field. “It was insane,” he said. It cost him. He suffered a stress fracture in his foot. Though he began the season playing, he could hardly walk after games. Inevitably, he ended up at the doctor. He got the news — his senior season was over — and broke down, sobbing.

“I felt like I let my whole family down,” he said. “It’s like I had this one goal that I worked at, worked at, worked at, and somebody just snatched that out from under me. I was crushed, man.”

Despite what the doctors told him, Hightower returned that season. He even managed 1,100 yards in the six games in which he played. But the recruiting calls from the schools he wanted to attend — Maryland and Virginia Tech and Wake Forest — stopped coming. Mark Gowin, Episcopal’s coach, tried reaching back out, selling his player not only on ability, but on attitude.

“He was such a tough kid,” Gowin said. “It was a frustrating time for both of us. He knew he could play at that level. I knew he could too. And no one was buying it.”

Breakaway speed

When Hightower arrived at Richmond as a freshman, he was both grateful for the opportunity to play college football — anywhere — and bitter that he wasn't doing it with a higher profile. That mix intensified as his college career moved on. His purpose was still to play in the NFL. But as he was moved to fullback, as his chances at recognition passed, his personality changed.

"I was so angry," Hightower said. "I was just so angry and bitter."

This led to a series of internal conflicts. "I never saw Tim say a bad word about anybody," Gowin said. But inside, the accumulation of slights both real and perceived burned.

"I felt like I was always kind of searching for an identity," he said. "I grew up in a Christian home, so I knew certain ways that I was supposed to be living. I wasn't really upholding those standards."

"What do you do with all these emotions? I was taught not to have sex before marriage. Okay, so what do I do when I'm having sex now? Am I bad? I'm going to go to hell now? I'm supposed to walk in love toward these people. Well, I'm angry. They just pissed me off. He just told me I was never going to play professional football."

Eventually, Hightower handled it by working. He spent so much time with Brandon Horrigan, Richmond's strength and conditioning coach, that "my wife probably thought I was having an affair," Horrigan said. Hightower would return to school early from Christmas break to train. But not merely to get in shape. Each workout had a purpose. He needed to be more flexible. And he needed to pick up speed. He joined the track team, and competed against the women, because if a girl beat him, he wouldn't live it down. He used plyometrics. Whatever Horrigan asked, Hightower did.

"He had aspirations and dreams, but he also had a ticker in him that kept him going to fight to get better, to be the best," Horrigan said. "A lot of guys, they have so much potential, but they never had that type of drive. He was so driven."

Before his senior year, Hightower approached Charles Bankins, Richmond's new running backs coach who had worked with runners such as Marshall Faulk and Steven Jackson in the NFL. Hightower wanted to know his chances as a pro.

"You're a good back," Bankins recalled telling Hightower. "You're a tough back. But you don't have breakaway speed. If you've got a shot, you'll be a free agent," meaning he wouldn't be selected in the draft.

"And he just shook his head," Bankins said. "He walked out and said, 'Okay.' "

In Richmond's second game of the year, Hightower broke through for a 90-yard touchdown run in the first quarter at Northeastern. When he got to the sideline, he went straight to the phone to the press box, where he reached Bankins, who was coaching from his perch.

"Coach," Hightower said. "That enough breakaway speed for you?"

He finished the day with 246 yards rushing and four touchdowns. By the end of the year, he had a Richmond record 1,924 yards and 20 scores.

So here is Hightower now, coming off a 25-carry, 72-yard performance against the New York Giants in his first game as a Redskin, one he realizes could have been much better, one that showed how far he still has to go.

Here's how he sees his goals, his purpose: "Until I got a couple championship rings on my fingers — a couple, I said a couple — and until I walk across the stage getting a yellow jacket, I won't be satisfied in this career."

Those are the purposes that drive Hightower now. Be a multi-time Super Bowl champion. Become a Hall of Famer. Sound crazy? Just don't tell him.

ASHBURN

--The package arrived in Dave Clawson's office a little more than six weeks ago with a postmark from Arizona and a familiar address on the return label.

Clawson wasn't expecting a delivery, but knowing Tim Hightower, he should have.

When the head coach at Bowling Green opened the box, one large enough it would be more suited to moving than shipping, he pulled out an Arizona Cardinals jersey autographed by his former player as well as a variety of hats, T-shirts and other trinkets for his assistants.

"The fact that he sent it here and he knows I have three coaches from Richmond, and he's been in the NFL for three years--he's just a good guy," Clawson said.

Hightower thought back to his days playing for Clawson at Richmond and the stories the coach would tell about Brian Westbrook, who played at Villanova for two years when Clawson was the offensive coordinator. Like nearly every other collegiate player, Hightower dreamed of the day when he'd be able to play professional football. Having now reached that level, the package served as a "thank you" to Clawson for helping him achieve that goal.

"You can't buy your appreciation for somebody else, but you do certain things to show somebody, regardless of whatever happens, 'Hey, I appreciate the coaching, I appreciate the support, I appreciate whatever it is,'" Hightower said. "Without that stuff, I wouldn't even be in the position that I am today. To me, it was almost a no-brainer. I was almost upset at myself I didn't do it earlier."

The opportunities to reconnect with his past have been plentiful of late. The weekend Hightower mailed the box, he, too, was sent packing--traded from Arizona to the Washington Redskins. He signed a one-year, $1.2 million contract after the trade to return to an area where he spent his high school years.

One final chance to complete the transition comes Sunday as the Redskins host the Cardinals at FedEx Field.

Though he won't have many family members or friends in the stands, he'll have a lot of people watching.

HUMBLE BEGINNINGS

While Hightower claims Waldorf, Md., as his hometown, he is quick to admit he's "a little bit of everything."

Born in San Diego, Hightower moved to Tulsa, Okla., for kindergarten when his parents, Lewis and Nikkie, took classes at the Rhema Bible Training Center and Oral Roberts. The family then headed farther east to Maryland to get involved in the ministry before Hightower started the seventh grade.

It was at Episcopal High School in Alexandria when Hightower started to make a name for himself in football. Named team captain his senior year, he rushed for 1,083 yards and 12 touchdowns before breaking his foot, which scared off a lot of colleges showing interest--Maryland, North Carolina and Virginia Tech among them. Interest was so low that Hightower feared he would not play football at a high level in college. Mark Gowin, his high school coach, then told him one morning assistants from Richmond had stopped by and wanted to have breakfast with him, and Hightower was quickly sold.

He committed to play at the school and was one of only three freshmen Clawson did not redshirt his first year. The head coach saw that Hightower's vision and strength would be an immediate asset in the Spiders' zone-blocking scheme.

"Tim was just so motivated to want to be great," Clawson said. "He wanted to be the strongest at everything, and he wanted to be the fastest, and he wanted to be the quickest. He had very specific goals for what he wanted to accomplish and was willing to work for them."

Hightower wasn't the primary running back until his junior year, but again, his senior year put him on the map. Richmond advanced to the Football Championship Subdivision semifinals, where it lost to eventual champion Appalachian State, and Hightower set school records with 1,924 rushing yards and 20 touchdowns.

Chosen by Arizona in the fifth round of the NFL draft the following spring, Hightower rushed for 399 yards and 10 touchdowns, including the winning score against Philadelphia in the NFC Championship game.

He started 31 of 33 games for the Cardinals over the next two seasons, but slowly fell out of favor with the club. Deciding to go with Chris "Beanie" Wells and rookie Ryan Williams of Virginia Tech, now out for the season with a knee injury, at running back, Arizona traded Hightower to the Redskins on July 31 for defensive end Vonnie Holliday and a sixth-round pick in next spring's draft.

"It was not an easy decision to trade him, but in order to be fair to Tim and give him an opportunity to be a starter, based on what he projected his role to be here, we thought it was a good move for both teams," said Arizona coach Ken Whisenhunt. "You never want to allow one of your good players to leave your team, but I have so much respect for Tim and what he did for us. I care about Tim, and I know he wanted to be the guy and have an opportunity to do that."

A HERO'S WELCOME

Hightower readily admits that if he played for the Redskins right after college, he might have struggled with adapting to the nuances of the professional game. Heading to Arizona essentially offered him the chance to grow up on his own.

"I don't want to say I needed it, but it was best that I went away for a little bit," Hightower said. "It would have been too much for me. You get a lot of requests, you get a lot of people pulling on you, you get a lot of demands. Now I'm three years in and I'm a little more comfortable handling things, telling certain people no, telling certain people, 'I can't do this.'"

Hightower often brings his own meals to Redskins Park rather than eat at the team cafeteria. He enjoys expressing his thoughts by writing, which helps him control his emotions. Having watched "The Green Lantern" over the summer, Hightower was taken by the message of using willpower to combat fear, and he has worn both a Green Lantern T-shirt and his own customized burgundy-and-gold version.

Once he gets established, he looks forward to working with his Tim Hightower Foundation to help mentor children.

"To be really honest, my biggest thing that I love doing is community work," Hightower said. "It keeps me accountable, appreciative and grounded, but also, I remember being that kid that felt like I didn't have that way out. You come from whatever and you felt like all you needed was a little bit of hope and a little bit of inspiration."

That's why the return comes at a good time both for Hightower and the Redskins, who were in need of a consistent running back. Hightower rushed for 72 yards on 25 carries last week in his debut, a victory over the New York Giants, and missed only two of 65 plays on offense.

Hightower likes to be the center of attention--for positive reasons, he emphasized--and insists he's more thrilled with a victory than any arbitrary rushing line he may produce.

Being a leader is a role he's embraced. Being humble is a trait he's maintained.

"He's made it, but he hasn't allowed himself to get too big for the people that were there for him when he started to make a name for himself," Clawson said.

Defensive End Jarvis Jenkins

Jarvis Jenkins Ready To Unleash The Beast

ASHBURN – Artis Hicks stared into the eyes of the dragon Friday morning and, with minimal baiting, got burned.

The right guard knew about Jarvis Jenkins, the 6-foot-4, 309-pound defensive end, after the Redskins drafted him in the second round, 41st overall, in April's NFL Draft.

But it wasn't until this week, during training camp at Redskins Park, that the eight-year NFL veteran fully discovered Jenkins' wrath. It didn't take much; the two paired up during positional drills, one-on-ones and the occasional scrimmage all week, and with each whistle, Jenkins has been hard to control.

"I'm excited for him, though, even though I battle him every day," said Hicks, himself a svelte 6-foot-4, 314 pounds. "He's a real strong, powerful guy. He's at the point now where he's learning how to use that strength.

"In college, you can dominate guys because you're bigger, stronger, more powerful, but now, everybody's bigger, stronger, more powerful. He's learning how to use leverage now. He's been more and more impressive."

Jenkins plowed through Hicks on three consecutive snaps Friday morning, at one point nearly knocking Hicks backward off his feet. It's that kind of explosiveness, that kind of raw power, that has the Redskins coaching staff eager to see more.

"I don't want to put the kiss of death on Jarvis, but he's what you look for in a defensive lineman," said coach Mike Shanahan. "He's got great size. You can tell that he's a student of the game. He goes out there and works extremely hard, extremely conscientious, and he's going to get better and better."

A first-team all-ACC defensive tackle at Clemson, Jenkins faces the challenge of moving to defensive end for the Redskins in their 3-4 scheme. Jenkins, though, said the adjustment has been easy, mostly because of the nature of the Tigers' defense; he played on a three-man front on occasion.

"This is a more technical-style defense," Jenkins clarified. "Every man has his job, so right now, I've got to do my job on the defense."

The lockout prevented Jenkins from doing a lot of mental preparation during the three months since he was drafted, but he kept busy by studying another way. He took two classes at Clemson to make progress toward his sociology degree, which he's now just six hours away from completing.

Still, even that had an averse effect. Because he was in South Carolina, he was unable to make it to any player-organized workouts, which means his first chance to see the playbook and get familiar with the defense was when camp opened a week ago.

“I’m going with the flow,” Jenkins said. “At first, it hit me kind of fast, because I couldn’t really do the OTAs. ... Once I got here, it took like two days to get used to, but once I did that, I was a head of steam just rolling with it.”

Not much will be expected of Jenkins in his rookie season, given that the Redskins have Adam Carriker entrenched on the left side and recently signed Stephen Bowen to man the right, ahead of last year’s starter, Kedric Golston. He’ll serve as a versatile back-up, working on either side.

Once that happens, opposing offensive linemen may be in for a surprise. Just ask Hicks.

“He’s coming out every day with a workman’s attitude,” Hicks said. “When you have talent and power, and you come out here with a worker’s attitude, you have no choice but to get better, because the coaches are coaching you with the proper technique that will make you get better. The sky’s the limit for that kid.”

Linebacker Ryan Kerrigan

Redskins vs. Rams: Brian Orakpo and Ryan Kerrigan are becoming quite a duo

Jason Reid
The Washington Post
October 2, 2011

Brian Orakpo and Ryan Kerrigan are good together. They have the right look. They appear headed toward very impressive things. For the foreseeable future, the Washington Redskins are extremely well positioned at outside linebacker, and that’s another significant step forward for them.

Even after just four games, the evidence is overwhelming. On Sunday, the St. Louis Rams experienced what the fast-rising tandem can do, as they dominated during a 17-10 victory at Edward Jones Dome.

Orakpo and Kerrigan made big plays throughout. Again, they provided momentum-changing moments. From start to finish, they tormented St. Louis, defeating whomever Rams coaches hoped would slow their path to quarterback Sam Bradford. Orakpo had a team-high 2½ sacks. His inexperienced partner contributed a sack and forced a fumble.

All of that only told part of the story. Their biggest contribution was in helping Washington’s defense overcome Rex Grossman’s bad closing act.

Aided by the quarterback's shoddy overall performance (48.5 passer rating), the inept Rams were still in the game in the fourth quarter despite Washington's heavily one-sided statistical advantage. Grossman's second interception could have proved disastrous — but Orakpo finished strong.

With less than five minutes remaining, Orakpo had an important third-down sack to slow suddenly charging St. Louis. The Rams got the ball back with plenty of time, but Bradford — sacked seven times and battered relentlessly behind a joke of an offensive line — had nothing left.

"The sack, man, yeah, it was huge," Orakpo said. "You could have easily given them the momentum. You could see it coming.

"Obviously, they scored [a touchdown on their previous possession]. Then they got the interception. Things were just going bad for us. We held and anchored our D. Guys made big plays."

Dejected after their late letdown in the Monday night loss at Dallas, the Redskins got the bounce-back performance they needed, improving to 3-1 entering their bye week. Surprisingly, the Redskins are atop the NFC East. Their new duo has helped them get there.

"Man, the sky's the limit for those guys," strong safety LaRon Landry said. "They can be as great as they wanna be."

Through the first quarter of Washington's schedule, its 3-4 defense is much more effective than last season. Nose tackle is the most important position in the scheme, and Barry Cofield has been good. The Redskins upgraded at that spot. Kerrigan also is essential in the improvement.

Outside linebacker is No. 2 in 3-4 importance. The powerful rookie from Purdue provides rushing balance opposite Orakpo, and "that's the whole premise of the 3-4 defense: get pressure on the quarterback, especially at your outside linebacker positions," inside linebacker London Fletcher said. "What you're seeing is that we have two very talented, young edge rushers."

Beginning with his improbable touchdown in the season opener against the New York Giants, Kerrigan has displayed a knack for being in the correct spot. He puts himself in position to make good stuff happen.

Of course, Kerrigan still must prove he's capable of playing at Orakpo's level over the long haul. Consistency, as always, is the key. Orakpo is a two-time Pro Bowler. Kerrigan has to hold up his end.

Midway through the second quarter Sunday, Bradford fumbled on Kerrigan's sack, and Cofield recovered the ball at the Rams 47-yard line. Three plays later, Ryan Torain scored Washington's second touchdown. The Redskins had a 14-0 halftime lead.

"I have to credit to the secondary," Kerrigan said. "That definitely was a coverage sack. They made Bradford hold on to the ball long enough for me to get there."

Veterans appreciate Kerrigan's wide-eyed humility. His work ethic has been just as important. The smarts he has displayed since player-only offseason workouts, though, provided the first indication the Redskins chose wisely in the draft.

"He picked up everything pretty quickly in training camp," Fletcher said. "He doesn't make the same mistakes twice."

Simply watching Orakpo has taught him a lot, Kerrigan says. "Every time [Bradford] dropped back," he said, "it seemed like 'Rak was back there tackling him."

Orakpo, who is in his third year, performed at a high level last season during the difficult transition from Washington's long-standing 4-3 to 3-4. For years, Washington had top-10 defenses. Statistically, the Redskins ranked among the NFL's leaders. But they weren't a big-play bunch. Knockout blows weren't the Redskins' thing.

Under former defensive coordinator Greg Blache, the Redskins jabbed, countered and focused on winning decisions.

Orakpo and Kerrigan are part of a new big-play foundation. Coach Mike Shanahan told coordinator Jim Haslett to give him a championship-caliber defense. With a clear mandate, Haslett needs everything Orakpo and Kerrigan have to offer.

"Man, I'm just happy to be a part of it," Orakpo said. "We've been saying all along that pressure is the key. That just getting the right guys to help us get to the quarterback . . . would make the difference.

"If we just got a guy on the opposite side of me like him [Kerrigan], a big nose in Cofield and added some other key elements, you'd see it arrive on the field. You see it now. We're something to deal with."

With their talented bookend linebackers, Washington's defense is getting closer. The group's expectations are higher. Who knows where it will all go? But it sure seems Orakpo and Kerrigan are beginning a long ride.

Kerrigan first 'Skin to win Rookie of the Month since 2008

NFL.com
September 29, 2011

The Washington Redskins are off to a surprising 2-1 start and a lot of their early success can be attributed to the play of rookie linebacker Ryan Kerrigan.

The NFL announced Thursday that Kerrigan has been named the league's Defensive Rookie of the Month for September, becoming the first Redskin to win the award since Chris Horton in September 2008.

Kerrigan, a first-round draft pick out of Purdue University, registered five tackles and returned an interception for the go-ahead touchdown in the Redskins' season-opening win over the New York Giants and finished the month with 13 tackles (five solo), five quarterback pressures, 1.5 sacks, one forced fumble, two passes defended and one interception.

In Washington's Week 2 win over the Arizona Cardinals, Kerrigan recorded his first sack of his career and tipped a Kevin Kolb pass that was then intercepted by linebacker London Fletcher.

Kerrigan totaled 210 tackles, including 57 for loss, 33.5 sacks, 14 forced fumbles, three fumble recoveries, one interception and seven passes defended in his four-year career at Purdue. His 14 forced fumbles tied the NCAA Football Bowl Subdivision record.

Strong Safety LaRon Landry

Amy Shipley, Mike Jones
The Washington Post
October 4, 2011

When his trainer advised him to try a popular but unproven healing therapy for his injured Achilles' tendon last year, Washington Redskins safety LaRon Landry did not hesitate. He wanted to get back to work.

It did not concern him that the recommended treatment, platelet-rich plasma (PRP) therapy, lacks scientific validation, has shown mixed results in a limited number of studies and involves drawing a dose of one's own blood and reinjecting it.

Landry now evangelizes like a PRP prophet. Since using the treatment for three different injuries, he's been spreading the word to teammates.

“I’m happy I went with it,” Landry said. “A lot of guys ask me about it, and when guys get hurt, I try to put them onto the PRP because I think it’s something they should be knowledgeable of if they’re trying to recover.”

Landry’s attitude is shared by increasing numbers of injured athletes in locker rooms and clubhouses nationwide, who are grasping at non-surgical options for fast healing. For men whose livelihoods depend on staying healthy, the occasional, and widely publicized, PRP success stories have caused the popularity of the procedure to far outpace the research behind it, experts say.

Published studies on the procedure are limited. One of the earliest, co-authored by Allan K. Mishra, a Menlo Park, Calif., orthopedist, suggests that PRP is effective at treating tennis elbow, but a later one concluded that it did not markedly help rotator cuff injuries.

The available research does not provide complete clarity, according to doctors, because no two PRP procedures are exactly the same. Doctors say they are not only uncertain about when to administer it, but precisely how to do it for optimal effect.

“There’s tremendous variation among different types of PRP,” said Scott Rodeo, who participated in the rotator cuff study and will be the team physician for the U.S. swimming Olympic team at the 2012 Summer Games in London. “My PRP is different than your PRP, because my blood is different than yours. All of those things add up to such variability it’s hard to analyze the data to get a handle on it.”

‘The pioneering beginning’

Athletes, however, seem to care little about such details. In the last few months alone, a host of players have tried PRP, including major league pitchers Jose Contreras of the Philadelphia Phillies, Daisuke Matsuzaka and Bobby Jenks of the Boston Red Sox, Brett Anderson of the Oakland Athletics and Jesse Carlson of the Toronto Blue Jays, as well as Wesley Matthews of the NBA’s Portland Trail Blazers.

“The athletes are the ones at the pioneering beginning, trying new things to accelerate healing,” Mishra said. “Athletes are dissatisfied with other options presented to them.”

Landry believed PRP therapy helped his Achilles’ tendon so much he also used it when he injured his shoulder and hamstring. Teammates Chris Cooley and Brandon Banks recently sought out PRP injections for their injured knees.

Some athletes are turning to even more unproven and newfangled therapies involving the use of adult stem cells; Indianapolis Colts quarterback Peyton Manning reportedly traveled to Europe for treatment on his neck that was not approved in the United States.

New York Yankees pitcher Bartolo Colon received stem-cell therapy in the Dominican Republic in 2010 that appeared to yield huge dividends but also sparked a Major League Baseball investigation.

Unlike stem-cell treatment and other methods that remain on the fringe in pro sports, PRP has become nearly as available as cortisone shots. Developed well over a decade ago, the treatment first garnered mainstream attention when Pittsburgh Steelers wide receiver Hines Ward used it to help him play in the Super Bowl in 2009. Its use spread quickly after that.

Landry traveled to Arizona for his PRP, but some teams now offer the procedure in-house. Even noted sports surgeon James Andrews — Banks's physician — acknowledged that his Birmingham, Ala., clinic has in the last year begun offering PRP, though only in certain cases. Andrews does not personally perform the therapy.

“It definitely has a future in trying to get certain injuries to heal, and to heal with a better response,” Andrews said. “The problem is we don’t know quite when to use it, and don’t know the different injuries that will respond best to it. All of it is pretty much anecdotal.”

Virtually no risk factors

Doctors and athletes say they are attracted to PRP because of its apparent safety, simplicity and lack of side effects. Blood is removed from the injured region and spun in a centrifuge to concentrate the platelets. When reinjected into the body, the concentrated platelets release growth factors that theoretically should promote faster healing. Because patients are receiving their own blood, risk factors are virtually eliminated.

Landry said his Arizona-based trainer persuaded him to use PRP therapy last year. He actually ignored the advice at first, trying to play through the pain. That decision, he said, made the injury worse. After he was placed on injured reserve, he eventually traveled to Arizona for the PRP treatment — and immediately became a believer. This summer, when he aggravated his right hamstring, he didn’t waste any time.

“The PRP doesn’t work for everybody; it’s more so trial and error,” he said. But “I loved it. . . . [It] really healed my Achilles. And my hamstring.”

Atlanta Braves left-handed reliever George Sherrill grew frustrated with nagging elbow pain that left him unable to lob a baseball from the pitcher's mound to the catcher a day after facing any hitters in games. But unlike Landry, he did not have to seek out the treatment. He received the PRP therapy from one of Atlanta's team physicians. Earlier in the season, teammate Kris Medlen also received a PRP injection.

"The [team] doctors brought it to me," Sherrill said before a game against the Florida Marlins in Miami last month. "They said it was an avenue to take. I said, 'If it will mean me throwing again this year, getting into the playoffs and, on a personal side, showing people I would be healthy next year, I'll give it a whirl.'"

Sherrill isn't sure the therapy made any difference at all; he speculated the rest he got before and after the procedure might have been responsible for the small benefit he noticed. Cooley, however, said each time he received it he felt 50 percent better.

Sherrill noted there also was an important side effect in his case.

"It was like this, after," Sherrill said, holding up his left arm and shaking it violently. "I had cortisone shots before, and this was 50 times worse than that. [A cortisone shot] feels like you stuck your arm over a stove. This felt like a truck ran over my elbow."

Negative press

Another downside is the negative publicity PRP has attracted when it has been abused. Canadian doctor Anthony Galea, who in July pleaded guilty to bringing misbranded drugs across the U.S. border, was accused by his personal assistant of mixing human growth hormone (HGH), a drug banned by nearly every sports league in the world, with the blood of some of his athlete patients before reinjecting it as part of the PRP therapy. Galea treated a host of prominent athletes, including golfer Tiger Woods, the Yankees' Alex Rodriguez and Redskins wide receiver Santana Moss.

Major League Baseball investigated Colon's treatment for a similar reason: The doctor who administered it had been known for using HGH as part of healing treatments.

PRP therapy has flummoxed the World Anti-Doping Agency, which originally banned it for intra-muscular use but lifted the ban this year — saying it did not have enough evidence to conclude that PRP aided performance in any way.

The key for players, of course, is whether it helps them heal.

“It’s a neat treatment,” Cooley said. “I can’t tell you the ultimate benefits to it. No one can. It’s still new. But I did feel better. . . . I’ve now had two or three guys around the league call me for advice on PRP and the effects of it.”

Tackle Sean Locklear

Gameday Q&A: Sean Locklear

Mike Jones
The Washington Post
November 6, 2011

During the offseason, the Washington Redskins signed veteran offensive tackle Sean Locklear, who had spent the majority of the previous seven seasons starting at right tackle for the Seattle Seahawks.

The Redskins envisioned Locklear as a backup to both left tackle Trent Williams and right tackle Jammal Brown, and when Williams went down with a high ankle sprain three games ago, Locklear took his place. Locklear has started the last two games at left tackle, and this week spent time preparing to play left guard in the event that Williams is able to return and coaches decide to keep Locklear as a starter.

The subject of today’s Gameday Q&A, Locklear discusses his versatility, growing up a Redskins fan in Lumberton, N.C., and more:

“I liked their style of offense. We ran a different offense in Seattle when Mike Holmgren was there, but the last two years there, we were running the zone scheme. And knowing Mike Shanahan’s history, that was something that appealed to me. When I took the trip, I knew what kind of linemen he liked. He likes athletic linemen that can move, not bigger guys, but guys that can move. I thought it’d be a great fit for me, and knowing his history, I expected him, since he’s won the Super Bowl and put out 1,500-, 1,600-yard rushers, so he knows what he’s doing.”

Did it take you a while to adjust to this version?

“Not long at all. Day 1, the first day I put on pads, Jammal [Brown] was gone for an absence and so first practice, I was out there, so that lets you know what I knew about the offense, being here the first day. But watching those guys through the preseason, Kory [Lichtensteiger], Trent [Williams] and Jammal, I just picked up more things and I’m still learning, but I’m comfortable with knowing how they run this thing.”

Is this version of the zone blocking scheme as similar as you expected?

“I was surprised because they said similar, but it is really quite the same with the play-calling and the way they want things to run. There’s a little more emphasis on certain points of how things are to be done, and I think that's because with him being the guru of the zone scheme, you're not going to get some of those details from other guys that you would from the guy that invented it."

How does your versatility help you and your team?

"It helps out a lot just with the experience level. I think it gives coaches confidence that they've got a guy that's played a lot of games and seen a lot of situations and played at a high level. I consider myself the sixth man, but I consider myself a starter too. I've started a lot of games in my career and[a] couple here and played well. But there's always room to get better."

What was it like going from guard in college to tackle in the NFL?

"In college, I played one year at right guard and the last year I played right tackle and left tackle, so it was a learning curve throughout those two years. When I was coming out, all the scouts were telling me I'd be a guard/center basically, and I got to camp at Seattle and they said 'We're going to play you at tackle.' So it was learning on the run because I only played two years of offense [after playing defensive line initially for N.C. State]. With more snaps and the more plays I got, the better it came."

How do you like being back on this side of the country after being out West for all those years?

"It's good. The time zone was the biggest thing. Being back close to family and friends where everything's not a five-hour flight. I'm not complaining about it, you just have to do it. But now rather than a five-hour flight, it's a five-hour drive and family can come up and visit, and when you get ready to do it, you're not planning months in advance for a plane ticket to get out here."

What was your favorite football team growing up?

"I grew up a Skins fan, and a 49ers fan. It's weird. Steve Young, Joe Montana and those guys. It's kinda ironic, my mom reminded me of a story when I first got here. I was probably in the fifth grade and Starter was big back then and she bought me a Starter hat, and it was a Redskins hat. I wore it to school and someone stole it from me. I remember I got home off of the bus and we went back to the school looking for it but we never found it. It was like $20 bucks and she still remembers that. I still remember it too. That kind of stuck in my mind. But I was always a huge Redskins fan."

So was that your dream to play for the Redskins?

"I'm sure it was. I was a tight end, but I was out there running routes saying I was Art Monk and those guys back in the day. And there's a huge Redskins fan base where I'm from [in Lumberton, N.C.]. It's either you're a Redskins fan, or you're a Cowboys fan. There's no in between."

You're a member of the Lumbee Tribe. What was that like growing up?

"Growing up in a tribe – I'm half Native American – you don't think about it at the time, but looking back and coming of age, you start to think and that very well may be why there is such a large Redskins following down there because we're Native Americans and you know what the symbol of the Redskins is."

Did you experience a lot of cultural differences as a Native American?

“Yes, and no. No because where I’m from there was a very diverse area. It was about 30-30-30 as far as percentage of Whites, Native Americans and Blacks, with a few Hispanics sprinkled in. So it was a really diverse area and culture. So, there were some cultural differences, but at the same time no just because of the diversity of the area.”

When you’re not playing football, what do you like to do?

“Golf. I have never broke 80, but I’ve shot low 90s a couple times before. I like golf and basketball. When I came out here, I was driving around and looking at all the golf courses, but it was training camp and so you don’t have any time. And then once the season started, I was like, ‘Well I’m not really playing, my body’s not sore. Maybe I’ll play on Tuesdays.’ But then it’s raining every day. So I’ve still never gotten a chance to play. I brought my clubs and everything, so that’s kinda sad. And now I’m looking and thinking, ‘Where was this weather when I had the chance to play?’ But I’ll get my chance in the offseason.”

Any other hobbies or little-known facts about Sean Locklear?

“I love kids. It’s kind of a funny thing. Any time there’s a new family member, I’m always sending gear. That’s my thing. I get a card or something and they say, ‘Hey, we’ve got a new one,’ that’s my thing. Even when I’m back home, I just stay home mostly, so I’ll have aunts and uncles over, bringing their kids and they’re getting in the pool in the summer, and I’m there just like a big uncle. I don’t have any kids so I spoil everybody else’s and then when they misbehave, I can call their parents. You can always send them home at the end of the night!”

Wide Receiver Santana MossDespite turnover, veteran Santana Moss remains a steady influence

Nathan Fenno
The Washington Times
September 7, 2011

Santana Moss was surrounded.

Music thumped in the locker room at Redskins Park. But the lyrics couldn’t drown Moss’ words. So the television cameras and microphones swarmed, something that seems to happen each time the veteran wide receiver opens his mouth.

The phalanx of media almost buried the face of the Washington Redskins’ offense.

Most of big names are gone — Donovan McNabb dispatched to the Minnesota Vikings, Clinton Portis looking for work — leaving Moss and fan-favorite tight end Chris Cooley as leaders of a largely anonymous group. With question marks at quarterback, an influx of young receivers and a reshuffled offensive line, Moss is the certainty in a unit buffeted by change.

“I’ve been here [six] years, and I never had the chance to grasp the offense,” Moss said. “There’s always been a change here or something there. It’s one of those moments where we have the advantage.”

Turnover has been Moss’ companion since the Redskins acquired him from the New York Jets for Laveranues Coles in 2005.

Mike Shanahan is his third coach. Five men have called offensive plays. Six quarterbacks — remember Patrick Ramsey? - lobbed passes to him.

“I’ve played with so many quarterbacks, man,” Moss said. “Every year that goes by, it’s something new. But I never really think about it.”

The turnover hasn’t helped the Redskins’ offense, ranked in the NFL’s bottom third in total offense over the past three seasons.

Last season’s total — 5,374 yards — ranked No. 18 in the league. It was the best in Moss’ six seasons in Washington. Each time, he’s led the team in receiving.

But after Moss voided his contract in February, the onetime University of Miami walk-on re-signed with the Redskins in July. Other teams called. He didn’t talk to them.

The past shuffling on the roster, among the coaching staff and in the front office at Redskins Park couldn’t keep him away.

“If I’m going to still play, why go somewhere and start all over?” Moss said. “If we put the right people in the right places ... we can really do some good things.”

That starts with feeling more at ease in his second year under offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan. Last season, Moss caught a career-best 93 passes for 1,115 yards and six touchdowns. Kyle Shanahan used Moss more in the slot than he ever played there before while Anthony Armstrong ran deep patterns.

The relative familiarity of the offense, regardless of the quarterback, seems a luxury to Moss.

Mention Kyle Shanahan’s offense and Moss drops superlatives like a late-night infomercial: “dynamic,” “wide-open,” “opportunity to be great,” “able to prosper.” But some parts of the offense aren’t exactly as seen on television. A grab-bag of veterans such as Armstrong, Jabar Gaffney, Donte Stallworth, Terrence Austin and two rookies, Leonard Hankerson and Niles Paul, are battling for playing time alongside Moss at receiver.

“We have a lot to work on still,” Stallworth said. “But we’re moving in the right direction. That’s the most important thing.”

Added Kyle Shanahan: “I think everyone is more comfortable with what we’re doing, and I think it’s showing.”

Trent Williams, the hulking offensive tackle, echoed the sentiment. In his second year in the league, Williams felt obligated to assume a leadership role on the offensive line after the turnover.

Moss is where he looks for an example. For stability. Even a mentor.

And as the music blasted in the locker room and the cameras cloaked Moss, Williams grinned and revealed perhaps the lone weakness of the offense's face.

"There's not much," Williams said, "he can tell me about blocking somebody."

Defensive Lineman Chris Neild

Thom Loverro: Redskins' Neild lives up to nickname

Thom Lovero
The Washington Examiner
September 12, 2011

When Chris Neild was a ninth grader in Stroudsburg, Pa., he had a dream.

It wasn't to play nose tackle for the Washington Redskins.

"He wanted to play point guard for the New York Knicks," said Fred Ross, his former high school football coach.

That would have made for an interesting scene -- a 6-foot-2, 319-pound point guard with a shaved head and full beard leading the Knicks on the floor of Madison Square Garden.

His destiny, though, lay in pizza. He ate his way into being a nose tackle.

"Every pizza house in Stroudsburg knew him by his first name," Ross said, laughing.

But he didn't lose that basketball athleticism, and it helped him Sunday with a surprising rookie debut -- two sacks of Giants quarterback Eli Manning in the Redskins' 28-14 win.

The rookie nose tackle hails from the heart of the Pocono Mountains, just across the Brodhead Creek from my hometown, East Stroudsburg, Pa.

When a kid from a Pocono high school makes the NFL, it is worth noting. It's long-shot land, which was what Neild was on draft day in April after a stellar career at nose tackle at West Virginia.

He was the next-to-last player picked in the draft, one step away from being the 2011 Mr. Irrelevant. With the presence of newly acquired Barry Cofield and the return of Antonio Bryant, Neild, a seventh-round pick, was a long shot to make the Washington roster.

But when the final cuts were made by Mike Shanahan, Neild was still around.

"I don't even think about the draft anymore," Neild said in the Redskins' locker room after Sunday's win. "I am where I am right now."

Right now, he is Chris Neild -- "The Pocono Punisher."

"I like that name," Neild said -- the nickname I put on him once I learned he was from Stroudsburg.

Neild expected to get some playing time Sunday. But he didn't expect to come up with two sacks.

He felt particularly good after his first sack in the third quarter, dropping Manning for a 6-yard loss.

"That was a missed assignment," he said. "I didn't hear the blitz change. Luckily it turned out for the best. It's loud out there."

Nose tackles generally are not sack machines. His job is to stuff the middle and give the other rushers a shot at sack glory.

"I told him at this pace he'll be a Hall of Famer," Cofield said.

Ross said while he was impressed with his former player's debut, he wasn't totally surprised.

"That is the kind of kid he is and how he was when he played for me," Ross said. "He is a heck of an athlete and a great kid. He's the best."

He is the "Pocono Punisher."

Punter Sav Rocca

In punting circles, Rocca hangs with best

Zac Boyer
Free Lance Star
October 14, 2011

As one of the all-time greats in Australian-rules football, Sav Rocca was used to living the life of a celebrity.

He'd be recognized on the street as the full-forward for the Collingwood Magpies, where he played his first nine seasons, or the North Melbourne Kangaroos, from which he retired after six more in 2006. Fans would want an autograph, or a photo, or at least the chance to say "g'day" to the man who scored 748 goals, a mark that puts him 13th all-time.

When he moved with his wife and three children to the United States to pursue a career as a punter in the National Football League shortly thereafter, the stardom was gone.

"I knew it would be like that, and I knew that the punter doesn't get the attention as most of the other guys, but I had a lot of attention back home and I'm willing to sit it out, in that sort of respect," Rocca said.

Rocca likely still won't be a star in the NFL--at least, not a face as recognizable as Peyton Manning or Tom Brady or Drew Brees. But his contributions to the Washington Redskins this season have already been almost as valuable.

The 37-year-old punter enters his first game Sunday against his former team, Philadelphia, among the league leaders in several punting categories. His 12 punts inside the 20-yard line tie Seattle's Jon Ryan for the most in the league, though the Seahawks have played one more game. He has not yet had a touchback--he had just two last year, and is averaging one every four games in his five years in the league. And his remarkable hang time on punts is contributing to a net punting average that, at 41 yards per punt, is sixth in the league.

"I've been doing this for a while at the collegiate level and the pro level, and I've never seen a person punt like him," said Redskins head coach Mike Shanahan. "I'm talking about putting it inside the 20, leg strength, just the way he handles himself. He's been a pleasure to be around. He's definitely a weapon. It doesn't happen very often where a guy can consistently kick the ball inside the 20 and consistently have the hang time that he has."

LEARNING A NEW GAME

The path to the NFL wasn't simple. The idea of retiring from the Australian Football League and working a regular desk job didn't appeal to Rocca, who had seen countrymen Ben Graham and Darren Bennett thrive as punters in the NFL.

Within a week of playing his final game with the Kangaroos in 2006, Rocca was on a plane to the United States, where he had a tryout with Buffalo. Despite his staying in the country to work with coaches and try to make contacts in the NFL, the Bills passed, and a series of emails to scouts for all 32 teams resulted in several more rejections.

It was only after extending his stay in the country for an additional period of time that Rocca was able to meet up with Graham, who talked to his agent about finding Rocca another tryout.

"I thought, I didn't want to die wondering if I could have made it in another sport," Rocca said. "I love sports and I love competing and I love getting the best out of myself, so that's why [I made the move]."

When he signed with the Eagles in 2007 at 33, Rocca became the oldest rookie in league history, coincidentally supplanting Graham. As complicated as the move to the United State was, the adjustment process was even more difficult. He had to learn the rules and his responsibilities, and found out there was a bit more to football than kicking the ball.

"A lot of it was like learning a new language," Rocca said. "I was trying to learn Japanese and understand it in two months, that sort of thing. It was the terminology and all the positions and the rules--I understood that I could catch the ball and kick it, but other things that go with the position, I had a lot to learn."

He adapted well in 2007, ranking in the middle of the pack in nearly all punting categories. By 2008, Rocca had grown more comfortable and quickly became one of the league's most consistent punters.

"He works really hard at what he does, especially playing Australian-rules football for 15 years," said Redskins kicker Graham Gano, who considers Rocca a friend. "He's just really good. If you watch him punt the ball, you hear the crowd ooh and aah, even on the road. That speaks for itself."

OFF TO WASHINGTON

Special teams coach Danny Smith always had a keen eye for Rocca's ability when the Redskins played the Eagles over the past four years. When Philadelphia decided not to re-sign Rocca for this season, he was atop Smith's wish list to take over as the team's punter after the Redskins had three last year.

The two teams agreed to a deal, but Rocca, then back in Australia because of the owners' lockout, needed to wait the better part of a week to get his work visa. Smith quickly found he was worth the wait.

"I don't know Australian-rules football, but if you think about it, they catch, throw, run, kick on the run. It's physical, those kinds of things," Smith said. "I really trust him. I know he trusts in me and what we're trying to do and how we're trying to do it. He does get it from a team concept. He's not a selfish person. He's not a selfish teammate. I like that."

Rocca's growing much more comfortable in Washington. He originally preferred signing with the Redskins because of the location; he moved with his family to southern New Jersey when he signed with the Eagles, but they've since sold their home to move here. Gano, recently a father, has from time to time asked for parenting advice, which Rocca is happy to give, and Smith laughed when he found out Rocca owns two pizza shops in Australia.

The transition hasn't been entirely complete. There's still an Australian-rules football occupying a shelf in his locker at Redskins Park, and Rocca reluctantly admits, with a degree of shame, that he still doesn't know all the rules of the American game.

It's another thing that he hopes won't draw any attention to him.

"It's nice to not have that here," Rocca said.

Running Back Evan Royster

Royster still living a dream

Local running back fighting for roster spot

Ashburn -- It's a bit like slipping back into the middle of a good dream after waking and realizing that the alarm won't go off for another couple hours.

After being drafted in the sixth round by his hometown team, running back Evan Royster is soaking up every moment he's a member of the Redskins. But with the end of training camp looming, a wake-up call is coming. The rookie running back could find himself relegated to the practice squad or cut altogether by the end of the week.

"It's very cool because I live with one of my friends from high school," Royster said. "It's something that I'm thankful every day. I'll never forget it."

But the comfort that the 23-year-old Chantilly native enjoys, having those nearby pulling for him as much as the logo on his helmet, means nothing on the practice field in Ashburn.

Alexandria native Tim Hightower, 25, has been the Redskins' starting running back. He returned to the area this season certain that he matured as an adult and a football player by starting his NFL career in Arizona.

"For me, I think it was good to be away at first and just kind of find myself and live that bachelor life by myself and come into my own," Hightower said. "Stepping back in here in this environment, I'm a lot more capable of handling it and focusing."

Royster got off to a good start in the preseason, running the ball 15 times for 66 yards in Washington's opener against Pittsburgh. But he hasn't played since as Hightower (25 carries, 170 yards) and fellow rookie Roy Helu (35 carries, 173 yards), picked two rounds before Royster, took nearly all the carries in the last two games.

But Royster is convinced he's doing just fine.

"I'm just along for the ride," he said. "There's not much you can do other than play to change other people's opinion. It's just about going out there and showing that you can play the game at this level."

Royster said his pass protection skills have improved, and he still hangs his hat on his ability to run the ball.

"He's improved at picking up the blitzes," offensive coordinator Kyle Shanahan said. "He's a guy that's willing and who's definitely smart enough to know it, but the more looks those rookie backs can get, especially in blitz pickups and protections and how fast those stunts will come and how fast those backers will shoot those gaps, it's something you really don't know until you see it. He's gotten a lot better at it."

With cuts on the horizon, his ability to earn a roster spot rests almost entirely on providing the Redskins depth in the backfield. His only special teams experience came during his redshirt freshman year at Penn State.

Hightower, himself a fifth-round pick in 2008, is familiar with the haze of unknowns that his younger teammate faces.

"I've definitely seen him progress, but I've definitely seen that kind of rookie mental slump," Hightower said.

"It's like when you do something good, you're praised for it. When you're not, [the coaches] may not talk to you for a little bit, and you really don't know where you stand, and that affects you on the field. I've definitely seen both sides with him."

Long-Snapper Nick Sundberg

Q&A with Redskins long-snapper Nick Sundberg, who likes to use a Taser on himself

He's not in the running for most popular Redskin, and he doesn't play one of the most glamorous positions on the team, but Nick Sundberg has a vital role as long-snapper.

After some ups and downs as a rookie, Sundberg has executed with improved consistency this season and appears to have found a home in the NFL.

In today's Gameday Q&A, Sundberg discusses how he became a long-snapper in the first place, his road to the NFL and a rather unusual hobby.

How does a player decide that he wants to become a long-snapper?

"It really wasn't my choice. My sophomore year of high school I switched from guard to center, and our long-snapper had graduated. We had a whole new coaching staff come in. The guys who came in, our offensive line coach was a snapper when he was younger, and he said, 'You play center, you might as well snap, too.' So he taught me how to do it. I was terrible at it. We had a new offensive line coach come in the next year and he took it real seriously. We started snapping five, six days a week, 150, 200 balls a day, really started taking it seriously, got a lot better my senior year. I still wasn't where I wanted to be. I was going to go to a [junior college] and thought I'd probably play center. I was a lot bigger then. I was probably 290. I kept hitting it hard, started losing a little weight, went to a couple competitions, got noticed, Cal needed a guy and I got an offer."

At what point did you feel like college and the pros were an attainable goal?

The guy who taught me how to snap – his name is Ben Bernard – he's the long-snapping guru in Phoenix, Ariz. He's now got around 30 guys long-snapping on D-I scholarships. I think I was around No. 15. There were quite a few guys that were ahead of me that I'd watched. The long-snapper for the Texans, [Jon Weeks], is a year older than me and I watched him a lot. He had a full ride to Baylor when I was a junior, so I really looked up to him and thought, 'Man, he's so good. He's got a full ride. I want to do that too!' And so my coach kept telling me, 'You keep working hard and keep working hard, you can do this.' I got to college and he said, 'College is just a stepping stone. You're going to be in the NFL some day.' I was like, 'Yeah, yeah, yeah, that's a long time away.' But sure enough, three years later, I was like 'I'm graduating early, I'm going home so I can train and get ready for the NFL.'"

What was it like when you got your first NFL opportunity?

"It was pretty sweet. Originally it was from Carolina. Went there as a free agent. Originally, it was kind of overwhelming. You want to have enough confidence in yourself that you can do anything at the highest level, especially as a specialist. You have to have faith in yourself. But it was still so awesome. I was sitting there with my mom, watching, trying to take calls. It was a really cool experience."

You're not a real big guy – 6-foot, 250 pounds. Do people recognize you when you go out?

“Not really... I live with Erik Cook so if we go out, I'm walking around with a guy who's 6-6, 310, so it's easier for people to notice him than me. But I don't mind. I just look like a little guy who hits the gym pretty hard.”

What do you do for enjoyment away from the football field?

“I'm an adrenaline junkie. When I was younger, I went sky-diving, bungee jumping. But my mom went through my contract thoroughly and said I can't go sky-diving or any of that stuff. But I live in Phoenix, where it's always nice and sunny and I've got a pool at my house, so pool days and pool volleyball is where it's at a lot of the time.”

If you weren't playing football, what profession would you have pursued?

“My mom is very good at what she did. She worked in sales for years at a company called Taser International and I used to go to the trade shows with her and was exposed to the sales aspect of things. I'd like to say I have pretty good people person skills and I like to go out and do things like that. I had a lot of fun when I was younger, especially working with a product like a taser, the one the cops use. I had a lot of fun when I was younger, experimenting. I would tase the crap out of myself. So I'd probably be working in that industry. Fortunately, I don't have to work a 9 to 5 right now.”

In real life? You tased yourself on purpose? Why, and what was that like?

“First time I ever did it, I was 9. It was Bring-Your-Kid-to-Work day. My mom's coworkers were messing with me and said, ‘You gonna take a hit today?’ And I said ‘Yeah!’ just trying to be cool or whatever, and my mom said, ‘Yeah, do it.’ I was like, ‘What?’ the only reason why I said yeah was because I was thinking she wasn't going to let me do it. Sure enough, she did it. They got me twice that day. It hurts. Every time they come out with a new one, I've tried it. Except for this last one because I haven't been around there a lot. But it hurts a lot. It completely incapacitates you. Usually it's a five-second run time. All your muscles lock up. When we did it, we tried to do it as safely as possible. We'd have two guys stand there so you don't face-plant. But the second it's off, it's off, and you're like, ‘What did I just do?’ there's no pain or anything. That's why I was able to keep going back to it over and over again.”

How does that feeling compare to a big hit on the football field?

Running Back Ryan TorainGameday Q&A: Torain on patience, fantasy football and Emmitt Smith

Mike Jones
Washington Post
October 16, 2011

After three weeks of riding the pine, Ryan Torain finally got a chance to play for the Washington Redskins and exploded onto the scene with 135 yards and a touchdown on 19 carries in Week 4 against the St. Louis Rams.

Now Torain is hoping to maintain his momentum for the Redskins although he doesn't yet know if he'll start against the Eagles.

Injury has been the main obstacle for Torain during his NFL career. A knee injury cut his rookie season short, a shattered elbow prevented him from playing the following year, and a hamstring injury forced him out of four games last season.

Torain entered training camp as Washington's starter, but then broke his hand and Tim Hightower overtook him. Now he's working to reclaim his job, but at the same time has maintained a positive, patient outlook.

In today's Gameday Q&A, Torain talks about his attitude, goals and love for the game.

You're coming off of a big game, a bye week and a good week of practice. What's your mindset right now?

"I'm excited to get back out there, motivated to just push the team, work hard and make big plays. We've been working hard all week, and we want to let our hard work show. I try to stay the same. I don't like the change. Just study, day-by-day, work with my coaches, teammates, go out in practice and just put it all together.

What have coaches told you about your role for this week's game?

"They really haven't told me what's going on. I just go out there in practice. It's up to the coaches what they want to do with me, and whatever they ask me to do, I'm going to do it."

What was it like watching and not knowing when you would get back on the field those first three weeks of the season?

"Patience. Definitely had to be patient and let everything work out. The coaches, they went with what was working at the time, and when they asked me to go out, I went out and did it."

Were you getting discouraged?

"This is a long season, and I knew I was going to be out there one way or another, so I just stayed focused, talked to a lot of friends and family. And my running backs coach always told me to stay ready because you never know when they were going to call me up, so I did."

A lot of people picked you up for their fantasy football teams after your last game. Now they're all asking if you'll start and want to know how much you'll play, and if you can have another big game. What's that like?

“It’s a little weird, but I like the fact that people are talking about me and want me to be out there. I enjoy hearing the feedback and I want to help them out, so hopefully I can do that by playing in the game.”

When did you first feel like you could make it to the NFL?

“Probably grade school. I’d seen too many guys out there for me not to be one of them. I just enjoy playing the game. I’ve been playing it since I was a little boy, and now I’m still playing it as a grown man. So I’m excited to do something that I love.”

Who were your favorite running backs growing up?

I definitely watched Emmitt Smith and Barry Sanders. Definitely was a fan. Barry Sanders was a flashy guy. And Emmitt Smith was a great player. I always watched him and he was on that next level, and was just awesome. I actually got to meet him my rookie year and that was something special to me because I grew up watching him all the time. Great player, great guy.

Were you a Cowboys fan?

You’ve dealt with a lot of injuries during your short career. How has that impacted you mentally?

“It made me stronger. Whatever hits you, you’ve got to keep moving forward. It’s not how you start, but how you finish. It gave me a lot more mental toughness and patience. You’ve got to let it all come to you. It’s a marathon, as a lot of friends tell me. If you want to play for a long time, you can’t force anything. You’ve got to stay patient.”

Torain's patience pays off in season debut

Zac Boyer

ASHBURN--Ryan Torain said all the right things over the past two months, patiently waiting for the opportunity he knew would come this season.

It finally arrived Sunday in St. Louis when Torain entered the 17-10 victory over the Rams midway through the second quarter.

Told to warm up and get ready, the running back made his presence known, picking up seven yards on his first carry and then running for 21 and a touchdown on the very next play.

All told, Torain finished with 135 yards and the touchdown on 19 carries. It was his fourth 100-yard rushing game of his career, all in his last two seasons with the Redskins.

"It was a very emotional game for me, so I just wanted to get out there and play," Torain said after the game. "I just wanted to give it my all and work hard."

Until that point, the Redskins had gained only 33 yards rushing, including 13 on six carries from Tim Hightower and 20 on four from Roy Helu.

Hightower, head coach Mike Shanahan said yesterday, injured a shoulder on his "third or fourth" carry, which complicated matters.

Torain quickly showed the same attributes that made him the team's leading rusher (742 yards) a year ago, planting his foot and making one cut through the gaps and picking up yards after contact.

On those first two rushing plays, he lowered his shoulder and plowed through Rams safety Darian Stewart, with the touchdown coming as Torain had his legs taken out of him at the 2-yard line and sailed over the goal line.

"He played extremely well," Shanahan said. "He was feeling good and made some excellent runs, some big-time runs, and hopefully he can do that the remainder of the season."

Torain spent the first three games on the sidelines but was ready to play a week ago in the Redskins' 18-16 loss at Dallas. The lingering factor was his hand; Torain hit it on a teammate's helmet the first week of training camp and was out nearly four weeks, making his adjustment difficult.

How the Redskins treat the running back situation likely will be a source of speculation heading through this week's bye and into, and perhaps past, the Week 6 meeting with Philadelphia.

The zone scheme Shanahan has used back to his days with Denver always has made room for several running backs, and the player who starts the game is not always the featured back.

Torain, who was a Bronco in 2008, knows how the game is played. That kept him focused, he said, and ensured he wouldn't be out of condition for when the time came.

"Every single game, they're always telling me to be ready, stay focused and keep working hard," Torain said. "I finally got that opportunity to get out there and make some plays."

Fullback Darrel Young

Injury gave Darrel Young wakeup call

The Washington Post

October 13, 2011

When Washington Redskins fullback Darrel Young strained his hamstring almost four weeks ago, he couldn't help but experience flashbacks from the 2009 preseason. Then a rookie linebacker out of Villanova, Young was cut before re-signing with Washington's practice squad.

He wondered whether his dream of playing in the NFL was about to end. A similar thought crept into his mind after last month's injury, which forced him to miss two consecutive games.

“It was miserable because after getting cut in ‘09 and then getting hurt, missing two games, it was like, ‘Why now?’” said Young, who last season switched to fullback but played sparingly. This preseason, he beat out Mike Sellers for the team’s starting fullback job. “But at the same time, I was doing something wrong, I feel, and I think it was an eye-opener for me to work harder and appreciate the things that I have.”

Young said he realized that once the season began, he stopped doing the little things he focused on during training camp to ensure he maintained his health. He stopped getting checked out by team doctors, he wasn’t stretched out as thoroughly, and he stopped soaking in the cold tub after practices.

“Those are the things you take for granted when you’re in a position of playing,” Young said. “I think the key to staying in this league is doing that stuff.”

After three weeks of relative inactivity, Young says, “I feel ten times better. I was a little nervous going into Monday’s practice because I didn’t know what to expect, but I feel good. I stayed through the bye week to receive treatment three times a day, but I feel good. I feel comfortable to where I’m at and I just want to get better, and I want to stay healthy.”

Young believes that now fully healthy, he can help the Redskins, but he wouldn’t say that his teammates missed his presence on the field while he was out.

“I don’t think anything was missing because I think [Chris] Cooley did a great job,” Young said referring to the tight end who filled in at fullback. “Any time you’ve got [Ryan] Torain averaging seven yards a carry and 5.1 after contact, I don’t think they’re missing me, but it’s just good to be back out there finally. It’s a dream come true to be in the NFL for me, and to be injured is something I just don’t even want to deal with.”

Cooley, whose route-running opportunities were limited by having to stay in and block, likely will embrace Young’s return as well.

Washington Redskins fullback Darrel Young learns from Mike Sellers

Rick Maese
The Washington Post
August 22, 2011

The Washington Redskins started each of the past two seasons with the oldest roster in the NFL. They have made a concerted effort this offseason to get younger. Nowhere is that more evident than at fullback, where Darrel Young, 24, is poised to supplant Mike Sellers, 36.

Forget any bad feelings, though. Young and Sellers have neighboring lockers at Redskins Park, chat throughout practice each day and hang out during their off time.

“D.Y. is awesome, man. He deserves to be the starter,” Sellers said. “He’s the man.”

Sellers, in fact, effectively helped prepare Young to take the veteran's job. That is an odd reality in today's NFL, where jobs are anything but secure. But it reveals why Sellers has been such a locker room leader and why it would be a difficult decision for coaches to exclude him from the 53-man roster.

"He's like my big brother," Young said. "I know inside he still wants to be playing fullback. But the way he's grooming me, still helping me, it makes me appreciate everything so much more."

Sellers has been a mainstay in the backfield for the past seven years. But he was moved to tight end at the start of training camp. On Monday, he worked out for the first time with the running backs, and Redskins Coach Mike Shanahan said Sellers will play in Thursday's preseason game in Baltimore at three positions: fullback, tight end and H-back.

Young has started the team's first two preseason games at fullback. Lining up at tight end, Sellers has notched a pair of catches but mostly has played late in the game with the reserves, prompting speculation among fans that he might have to sweat out the team's final cuts.

Even if the team keeps Young and Keiland Williams at fullback, and Chris Cooley, Fred Davis and Logan Paulsen at tight end, Sellers still has his selling points. He's a former team captain who's well respected, particularly among younger players such as Young, and he's still a top contributor on special teams.

Sellers said that because of "all the speculation" surrounding his future in Washington, he has chosen to steer clear of the media this preseason. But he said he greatly admires the man who appears set to take his spot in the backfield.

"He's been a great student," Sellers said of Young. "It's a father-son type thing."

Said Young: "As a man, the respect I have for Mike — I feel bad in my heart. I want to play and I know he wants to play. I just want to compete. I don't want to look at it as anything outside of that. On the field, it's business."

Young played running back in high school on Long Island, but converted to linebacker in college. He moved to strong safety his senior year at Villanova, but when he came to the Redskins in 2009 as an undrafted rookie, he hoped again to play linebacker.

After three weeks on Jim Zorn's practice squad in 2009, Young was released. The Redskins re-signed him immediately after the season — the same day Shanahan was hired as coach. The new coaching staff reviewed film and quickly decided that Young could help the team more as a fullback than a linebacker.

"D.Y. is an excellent fullback," Shanahan said. "I can tell you that after being around him the first couple of weeks. He's very smart, very competitive. It's hard to find guys in that 250-pound range that can block and catch the ball like he can."

Size and natural ability are one thing, but to learn the new position, Young spent as much time as possible around Sellers, a former Pro Bowler. Young was primarily a special teams contributor last year; he had three carries and caught one pass, a touchdown against Philadelphia.

He said he entered this year's camp with a completely different understanding of Shanahan's offense.

“I couldn’t even explain to you how different I feel,” he said. “Last year I was nervous about what the defense would do . . . After playing behind Mike Sellers and watching him for a whole season, having him basically teach me, converse with me on a play-to-play basis on why he did what he did — the game is coming easier to me, slowing down now.”

Even though Sellers has spent most of the preseason with the tight ends, the two still constantly talk about the fullback spot.

“I come to the sideline and I don’t even think he’s paying attention,” Young said. “He’ll say, ‘D.Y., you need to do this,’ or ‘Why’d you do that?’ He’s more than just a player to me. He’s a big brother, someone I can rely on.”

Young looks to be a key component of a ground game that needs to post big improvements. The early returns are good: After posting the 30th-ranked rushing attack in the league in 2010, the Redskins have 354 rushing yards in preseason — more than every team except San Francisco.

“The backs we have in this offense and the scheme that Coach Shanahan has put together for us,” Young said, “it’s going to be a good season.”

Redskins’ Darrel Young gets inspiration from across the world

Rich Campbell
The Washington Times
August 8, 2011

It was about 8 a.m. Tuesday in Kandahar, Afghanistan when Darrel Young scored his first and only NFL touchdown. Back in Landover, Md., on that rainy Monday night last November, the reaction among Washington Redskins fans inside FedEx Field was subdued. Their team was being bludgeoned by the Philadelphia Eagles, and this hardly was any consolation.

But in Sgt. 1st Class David Young’s tent on Forward Operating Base Walton, the tent with the satellite TV hookup, the crowd went nuts.

“They were like, ‘Your brother scored! Your brother scored!’” Sgt. Young recalled Saturday. “I was like, ‘My brother?’ They showed the instant replay, and I was like, ‘Oh my God! My brother scored!’ “

His pride was strong enough that day to travel the 7,000 miles back home. Sgt. Young’s little brother, who had been cut by the Redskins the previous summer, had achieved one of his highest goals.

Now fast forward to training camp at Redskins Park on Saturday afternoon. Sgt. Young’s eyes widened as Darrel strolled into one of the VIP tents after practice. Because Sgt. Young recently returned from a year in Afghanistan, this was the first time he had seen in person Darrel wearing a Redskins uniform.

“It’s a humbling experience to see somebody who took a dream and made it reality,” he said. “I was talking to a few of the fans today. I told them, ‘That’s my brother.’ “

Sgt. Young, 31, might have been the most appreciated supporter at Redskins Fan Appreciation Day on Saturday. Darrel (pronounced duh-RELL) turned first to him after being released during final cuts in 2009. He needed guidance and reassurance, so he drove to Fort Bragg, N.C., where his older brother still lives.

“He told me some things: It’s football; things happen; it’s a business,” Darrel recalled. “He told me to wait for my opportunity, and my opportunity came last year.”

Darrel, 24, first tried to make the team as a linebacker. Coach Mike Shanahan’s staff, however, converted him to fullback in March 2010. That gave the undrafted free agent from Villanova enough of a foothold to make the final roster.

Sgt. Young called from Afghanistan after final cuts last September to congratulate his little brother. And then he had to figure out how the heck to watch 16 Redskins games from a war zone across the world.

“If there’s a will, there’s a way,” Sgt. Young said. “I called my dad and said, ‘Send me my TV.’ I bought the cable box. Then I went into the local economy and bought a satellite.”

Some of the locals showed him how to lock the signal. He used the Armed Forces Network coming from Europe. Before the Monday night game against Philadelphia, he and some other troops worked through a sandstorm to establish the signal.

Sgt. Young ran the food service facility for the entire camp, so he already was one of the more popular people among the Army’s 525th Battlefield Surveillance Brigade. You can imagine how his status skyrocketed once he started showing college and pro football games on his TV. His quarters became known as “The Football Tent.”

Troops would gather to watch their favorite teams. World Cup soccer and golf tournaments also were major attractions, but nothing compared to Redskins games. “It was fun having all the soldiers out there watching, and they’re wondering why you’re cheering so hard,” said Sgt. Young’s wife, Centoria, who is a Sgt. 1st Class. She recently was deployed with her husband at FOB Walton, collecting human intelligence.

“It’s just amazing,” she said. “We’re so proud of Darrel because he had a dream and he kept his mind set on it. He didn’t give up for anything, no matter what came at him. For us, that’s inspiring.” The feeling is mutual. Darrel is practicing with the first-string offense this training camp, and he stays hungry by remembering his brother’s sacrifice and the advice from two summers ago.

“He’s always been a big inspiration in my life,” Darrel said. “For him to go over there and do what he did for the country and to go out every day and not know what’s going to happen, it just makes me look at life a little different. To listen to the stories that he tells and stuff like that, this right here is fun, but over there is real-life situations.”

Outside the VIP tent Saturday, Darrel was talking to his older brother when a man and his daughter approached. The man asked for an autograph and then a picture.

Sgt. Young volunteered to take the photo while little brother posed with the fans. Darrel lifted up the little girl, and there were smiles all around.

“He’s still my younger brother,” Sgt. Young said, “but he’s a superstar now.”

Offensive Tackle Willie Smith

OT Smith beats odds to make 'Skins' roster

ASHBURN

--Willie Smith was beaming a week ago when, while sitting on a bench overlooking the practice fields at Redskins Park, he told his mother, Beverly, on the phone he had survived the Washington Redskins' first round of cuts.

How did it go when he let her know he made the 53-man roster on Saturday?

"I was ecstatic, man," Smith said, smiling. "It was like a dream come true, man. To know all of your hard work paid off from high school all the way through college and to camp, which was real tough--to know that all that hard work finally paid off is a good feeling."

It will take a while for the luster to fade for the 6-foot-6, 290-pound rookie out of East Carolina. Smith, an offensive tackle, was the only one of 15 undrafted free agents to make the Redskins' initial regular-season roster.

Players such as Houston running back Arian Foster, the NFL's leading rusher last season, have had success without hearing their names called on draft day. But in a typical year, many teams have one or two undrafted rookies make the team. Chicago had five this year after only 12 made the Bears' opening-day roster in the past 40 years.

Smith started his final 27 games at East Carolina at left tackle, was a first-team all-Conference USA selection and was invited to the NFL combine in March.

His reputation, though, was that while he has excellent agility and is adept at pulling--which makes him a good fit for the Redskins' zone-blocking scheme--he generally had bad form and occasionally missed assignments outright.

"[Going undrafted] was like Mike Tyson punched me in the gut," Smith said. "But I just said I'm going to keep my faith, keep working hard and I'm going to get my opportunity, and that's what I did. I took advantage of it."

He has struggled occasionally with the Redskins over his first five weeks with the team. But head coach Mike Shanahan and offensive line coach Chris Foerster liked him enough to keep him over veterans Artis Hicks, Clint Oldenburg and Selvish Capers.

"He's got a lot of talent," Shanahan said. "We didn't want to take a chance and put him out there [on waivers to get him on the practice squad] and lose him."

Locklear, a five-year veteran in Seattle who signed with the Redskins before the season, spent much of his time at right tackle with the Seahawks but was listed at left tackle on the initial depth chart. Cook, the backup center, is slotted as the reserve at guard as well.

And Smith has never played, nor been asked to play, guard as a pro. He's listed as the backup to Brown at right tackle.

"Wherever they need me, man, I'll do whatever for the team," Smith said.

Four of the five starters are entering their second year in the scheme, with Montgomery moving from right guard and Chester signing a five-year deal to come over from Baltimore when the lockout ended.

That continuity should help a unit that struggled at times last season. The line played well over the Redskins' first three preseason games, providing adequate protection for quarterbacks John Beck and Rex Grossman and opening plenty of holes for running backs Tim Hightower and Roy Helu, but its play in the preseason victory over Tampa Bay on Thursday was suspect at best, especially inside.

Smith doesn't appear likely to crack the starting rotation any time soon, though he could see plenty of snaps as a reserve.

For now, though, that's fine for Smith, whose first sign that he was officially a member of the Redskins came when he moved from a temporary metal locker in the middle of the room to a permanent wooden one on the periphery.

"There are so many things you have to work on to become an elite player in this league, and that's all I'm working on every day," Smith said.

EXTRA POINTS

The Redskins' depth chart for Sunday's opener against the New York Giants lists Roy Helu ahead of Ryan Torain as the backup to running back Tim Hightower. It also has fifth-round draft choice Niles Paul ahead of Leonard Hankerson, the third-rounder, as the third- and fourth-string receivers, respectively, behind Jabar Gaffney.

Tight end Chris Cooley (knee) and strong safety LaRon Landry (hamstring) are both listed as starters despite their lingering injuries.

Running Back Ryan Torain

Torain's patience pays off in season debut

ASHBURN--Ryan Torain said all the right things over the past two months, patiently waiting for the opportunity he knew would come this season.

It finally arrived Sunday in St. Louis when Torain entered the 17-10 victory over the Rams midway through the second quarter.

Told to warm up and get ready, the running back made his presence known, picking up seven yards on his first carry and then running for 21 and a touchdown on the very next play.

All told, Torain finished with 135 yards and the touchdown on 19 carries. It was his fourth 100-yard rushing game of his career, all in his last two seasons with the Redskins.

"It was a very emotional game for me, so I just wanted to get out there and play," Torain said after the game. "I just wanted to give it my all and work hard."

Until that point, the Redskins had gained only 33 yards rushing, including 13 on six carries from Tim Hightower and 20 on four from Roy Helu.

Hightower, head coach Mike Shanahan said yesterday, injured a shoulder on his "third or fourth" carry, which complicated matters.

Torain quickly showed the same attributes that made him the team's leading rusher (742 yards) a year ago, planting his foot and making one cut through the gaps and picking up yards after contact.

On those first two rushing plays, he lowered his shoulder and plowed through Rams safety Darian Stewart, with the touchdown coming as Torain had his legs taken out of him at the 2-yard line and sailed over the goal line.

"He played extremely well," Shanahan said. "He was feeling good and made some excellent runs, some big-time runs, and hopefully he can do that the remainder of the season."

Torain spent the first three games on the sidelines but was ready to play a week ago in the Redskins' 18-16 loss at Dallas. The lingering factor was his hand; Torain hit it on a teammate's helmet the first week of training camp and was out nearly four weeks, making his adjustment difficult.

How the Redskins treat the running back situation likely will be a source of speculation heading through this week's bye and into, and perhaps past, the Week 6 meeting with Philadelphia.

The zone scheme Shanahan has used back to his days with Denver always has made room for several running backs, and the player who starts the game is not always the featured back.

Torain, who was a Bronco in 2008, knows how the game is played. That kept him focused, he said, and ensured he wouldn't be out of condition for when the time came.

"Every single game, they're always telling me to be ready, stay focused and keep working hard," Torain said. "I finally got that opportunity to get out there and make some plays."

Defensive Back Josh Wilson

Washington Redskins cornerback Josh Wilson's acclimation to his new team has been a gradual process, but on Monday he turned in his best performance of the young season and one of the strongest outings of his career.

Playing in his third regular-season game for the Redskins, Wilson recorded four pass breakups, four tackles and a fumble recovery.

"I thought Josh was excellent," Redskins defensive coordinator Jim Haslett said of Wilson on Thursday. "He had four pass breakups, played real well, covered well. I thought he played really well this game."

One of Wilson's pass breakups came in the end zone when Tony Romo went for Martellus Bennett on second-and-goal from the 5-yard line. Wilson deflected the pass to deny the Cowboys, who didn't score a touchdown all game.

Wilson surrendered only one reception – a six-yard catch – on the night. Prior to Monday, he had never registered more than four pass breakups in one game.

"It was just, the more comfortable I get in the system, the more I can start making more plays," said Wilson, who this offseason signed with his hometown Redskins after spending one year with Baltimore and three in Seattle. "I got the crash course of the defense real quick, and now it's week 8 in my mind – Week 8 of being here – and I'm not having to rely on the safeties and can make calls myself. It's just allowing me to be more free and concentrate on what the other team's doing rather than thinking about what I'm doing."

Wilson said gaining comfort to Washington's defensive scheme required mild adjustments because while with the Ravens, he found himself in press coverage the majority of the time. But Haslett likes to mix up coverages, so Wilson and his fellow defensive backs will play man-to-man sometimes, zone other times and work to confuse a quarterback with their unpredictability.

Wilson said that he feels that in this system, he has a greater opportunity to make plays, but wishes that he could have only come up with a take-away against the Cowboys.

"It's a lot of things I could've done even more to help the team. If I could've caught one of those [pass break ups], it would've changed the game," Wilson said. "I definitely feel like I'm developing to where I want to be."

Josh Wilson: Redskins' fan base tops Ravens'

Mike Jones

The Washington Redskins and Baltimore Ravens meet Thursday for their annual 'Beltway Battle,' an affair that the players don't really see as a legitimate rivalry.

Redskins players see this week's meeting as significant because it is the third preseason matchup – the game in which the starters play the most – and because they want to measure themselves against a playoff team like the Ravens.

The Ravens certainly have been the more successful team of the two, reaching the playoffs seven times in the last decade. Washington has reached the playoffs only twice since 2000.

Ravens coach John Harbaugh may see the game somewhat differently. After all, he said this summer that when it comes to fanbases, he wants the Ravens to "take control of this whole area. We'll take over Washington D.C. while we're at it."

New Redskins' cornerback Josh Wilson doesn't know if that will ever happen, but he said as things currently stand, Washington wins when it comes to fan support.

Wilson grew up just outside of D.C., rooting for the Redskins. He played for Baltimore last season and said there is no comparison between the two fan bases.

"One thing about it, they have nowhere near the tradition of Redskins fans," Wilson said with a grin. "...My uncle is 50-so years old and all they know are Redskins and you'd almost think somebody's died when the Redskins have lost. And now I'm getting all these phone calls asking, 'What do you think about this?' and they think I'm going to give them all the insight, and I'm like, 'Get out of here!' But the Ravens have a strong fanbase up there. They're growing and getting kind of that establishment that the Redskins already have."

Wilson said he looks forward to facing the Ravens, however.

"It's always a little something extra and a little more fun when you're preparing to go against your friends," Wilson said. "It should be fun going up there and seeing all those guys. Last week I heard they booed [former Ravens fullback] Le'Ron McClain, so I expect a lot more cheers this week than what you normally would get on an away game."
